

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. WALKER REMODELLED.

A NEW CRITICAL
PRONOUNCING DICTIONARY
ENGLISH LANGUAGE,

ADAPTED TO

The Present State of Literature and Science:

EMBODYING

AND WEBSTER,

AND MANY WORDS IN MODERN USE NOT INCLUDED IN FORMER DICTIONARIES.

EXHIBITING

THE PRONUNCIATION OF WORDS IN UNISON WITH MORE ACCURATE SCHEMES OF SOUNDS
THAN ANY YET FURNISHED, ACCORDING TO PRINCIPLES CAREFULLY AND LABORIOUSLY INVESTIGATED:

EXPLAINING THEIR MEANING BY CLASSIFICATION AND MUTUAL REFERENCE, AS WELL AS BY IMPROVED DEFINITIONS;

AND ACCOMPANIED BY

- I. HINTS FOR SURMOUNTING DEFECTS OF UTTERANCE, FOREIGN, PROVINCIAL, VULGAR, AND IMPEDIMENTAL.
- II. AN ETYMOLOGICAL INDEX OF COMMON TERMINATIONS.
- III. A KEY TO THE PRONUNCIATION OF GREEK, LATIN, AND SCRIPTURE PROPER NAMES.
- IV. A BRIEF APPENDIX ON THE PRONUNCIATION OF MODERN FOREIGN NAMES.

LONDON :

Printed by WILLIAM CLOWES AND SONS,
Stamford-street,

P R E F A C E.

THE following "PROSPECTUS" was affixed to this work during its publication in Parts:—

"The undertaking for the Original Proprietors of WALKER'S DICTIONARY was simply to improve the last Edition of their Work; but, in fulfilling this task, MR. SMART has really produced a new Work, of which the chief features are:

"I. A more accurate analysis of the sounds of the language, with correspondent Schemes and Principles of Pronunciation.

"II. A method of indicating the pronunciation of words, which, by renouncing altogether the pretence of exhibiting no more letters than sounds, is less barbarous to the eye, and at once intelligible.

"These are the altered features of the work as a 'Critical Pronouncing Dictionary':—other improvements of a higher kind are attempted:—viz,

"1. To exhibit words in such a manner as to make those of the same family throw a light on each other's meaning and application.

"2. To furnish as much insight into the etymology and composition of words as can be given to a mere English inspector.

"3. To mark, in instances that require it, the change from ancient to modern usage, and to distinguish words that are obsolete or obsolescent, technical, unusual, partially authorized, or vulgar.

"4. To restore from Johnson's Dictionary the obsolete words which WALKER omits, because they are necessary to the reading of authors of the Elizabethan age; and to insert, from TODD, WEBSTER, and other sources, ALL the important words which the progress of literature and science has accumulated since the days of JOHNSON.

"5. To define, with cautious exactitude, words applied to the assumed data in all general or abstract reasoning, and which refer in any way to the process itself: because, in a Dictionary meant for general use, it is deemed highly important to indicate the fact, that words are not merely the expositors, but are also the INSTRUMENTS of thinking."

I record this Prospectus not merely as a statement of the objects proposed, but to justify the title, Walker remodelled, which the proprietors give the work, and my own claim, notwithstanding that title, to be considered its author, and not the mere editor. I have indeed copied from Walker the method of referring, throughout the Dictionary, to principles of pronunciation laid down at the commencement;—I believe his Dictionary owes its reputation to the obvious excellence of this plan;—but judging those principles susceptible of material improvement with respect both to the discrimination of the sounds, the method of indicating them, and the manner of developing the rules, I have entirely re-cast and re-written the whole of that part of his work: And, with regard to the Dictionary itself, I believe a single glance at its pages will be sufficient to show that, whether for the better or the worse, it is different in plan and execution not only from Walker's Dictionary, but from all its predecessors of like bulk and similar pretensions. In other dictionaries of this kind, the uniform practice has been, to take the definitions implicitly from Johnson ; but the etymologies and authorities were necessarily omitted ; and, hence, words are very often jumbled together whose different origin he distinguishes, and senses are brought forward which, being unsupported by examples, are not unfrequently obscure, and almost always deficient in the appearance of connection and easy transition. In the absence of authorities, I have thought it necessary to give the best clew I could to all the possible senses of a word, either by stating the general meaning first, and hence deducing its ascertained special applications, or by first laying down its literal or primitive use, and hence obtaining its derivative or figurative senses. It seldom happened that, in accordance with this intention, I could take the definitions exactly as I found them. I had besides to introduce, in the best way I could, some twenty thousand words which are not to be found in Walker : of these, a very few do not appear in any other dictionary ; the rest being supplied by Todd, Webster, and other collectors : but though the materials were provided to my hand, the arrangement, in a work of this limited compass, required much contrivance, and was attended with considerable anxiety. I found in fact that I could not act up to my own views without throwing the scissors quite aside, and working wholly with my pen ; and there is not, in consequence, a single page of this Dictionary which I have not written out and sent to the printer in manuscript. The opinion, moreover, which I entertain of the relation between the reasoning process and the instrumentality of language,—an opinion not new, perhaps, but, if just, not sufficiently indicated or insisted upon in lexicography,—rendered it necessary that I should pay a more than usual attention to certain terms which have reference to the relation I speak of, or remarkably display the wrong notions we are apt to acquire by not regarding it. On this point, without explaining myself further in the brief limits of a preface, I may refer my reader at his leisure to such heads as Thinking, Idea, Sense, Consciousness, Notion, Opinion, Truth, Moral (Certainty), Reason, Logic, Syllogism, Essence, Axiom, Science, Knowledge, Philosophy, Physics, Metaphysics, Fatalism, Foreknowledge, Freewill, Nature, Chance, Good, Evil, &c.

In short, having ventured to innovate on the plan of other dictionaries, which, like this, sacrifice higher pretensions to convenience of bulk, I wish, as I must be responsible for the defects, to put in my claim to the merits also, if haply any merits should be found. For this meed I have toiled hard and earnestly, and not, I can assure my reader, as a mere mercenary labourer. I feel it due to my Son to add that I have not worked alone : he has been my co-operator throughout the whole, and has often assisted me in more essential respects than those of collation or transcription.

PRINCIPLES of ORTHOGRAPHY	186-196	xlv-xlvi
☞ With respect to the Orthography of Participles, the inspector will find some additional instruction under "Participle" in the Dictionary.
PRINCIPLES of ETYMOLOGY.....	Prin. 197-200	p. xlvii-xlix
☞ The inspector is referred to the Dictionary for such information as belongs to this head, but is not placed under it: thus the irregular inflections of verbs are placed with the verbs: the rule for using the subjunctive mood occurs under "Subjunctive," and for Shall and Will under "Shall."
Index of the more important Common Terminations		p. xlix-lxix
☞ The Inspector is admonished that the Dictionary furnishes the counterpart to this Index, by directing especial attention to all parts of words which are of the nature of common prefixes, including not only real prefixes, such as Ad , Asa , Apo , Be , Cata , Fore , Hyper , Hypo , In , Un , &c.—not only foreign or English words which transmit their meaning to many compounds, as Arch , Capital , Mono , Quater , &c.—but all words whatever which, having initial syllables common to many other words, have likewise common root, and fall with them into families or classes. This reference to the common parts of words final and initial, will, it is presumed, be highly useful, inasmuch as few compounds can occur, though not inserted in the Dictionary, that will not be explained by it.

CRITICAL PRONOUNCING DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE..... p. 1-696

In the arrangement of the words, the strict alphabetical order must be expected only among those printed in the larger capitals: the subjected words, whether in small capitals or small letters, are given in such order as other purposes require. For further instructions on this point, and for the meaning of the Italics, the double accent ("), and other indicatory expedients, see the commencing page of the Dictionary. The Inspector is further admonished, that words formed with the prefix De- are kept distinct from those that alphabetically intervene; also that those which commence with Ch are not mingled, but kept distinct, according to the three different sounds to which the letters Ch are liable.

In a Dictionary meant, as this is, for general use, a great many words are inserted which in reality are not English, but, being used in English discourse, stand nevertheless in need of explanation. For the reading of old authors, and also for tracing the meaning of numerous modern terms, many obsolete words are inserted, and likewise many which occur only in technical, local, or inferior use. That these may not be confounded with words of ordinary use or general good acceptance, an indication is added, such as Obs. (for Obsolete), Her. (for Heraldry), &c.; or the name of the author in best repute who uses the word. See the Abbreviations and Authors' Names below.

INTRODUCTION

AND

PRINCIPLES OF PRONUNCIATION.

Αὐτὴ ἀναγκάζει τρία ἰσάχιστα τὰ πύσσοντα ἅμα εἰς τὴν ἀκοήν, φέγγει τε καὶ χροῖον καὶ συλλαβήν ἢ γράμμα.—Plutarch. de Musica.

In language spoken as in language sung, there are three things which reach the ear simultaneously, tone or modulation, time or rhythm, and syllable. In each of these respects, every language agrees with others generally, but differs in certain characteristic peculiarities. It is to the English language and its oral characteristics that the Schemes and Principles are to be adapted; and that quality or element which happens to be mentioned last in the quotation given above, properly comes first under consideration.

A syllable is not always, nor usually, an ultimate element of speech: we begin, then, with vowels and consonants, which are the elements of syllables.

The vowel sounds of the English language are, in strict theory, only seven, which, beginning with that requiring the narrowest opening of the mouth, proceeding to the broadest, and thence to that which most contracts it at the sides, are, ē, ā, ur, (the r mute, but giving to the u the sound heard in urgent,) ah, (the h mute, but signifying the Italian sound of a,) ave, (the ve mute, but signifying that the previous letter has the broad sound called the German a,) ō, and ǫ. But these seven sounds, modified, qualified, and compounded, give existence to fifty-five varieties of vowel sound, as exemplified in the former of the two schemes in the ensuing pages. The consonant sounds are twenty-two in number, but, for practical reasons which appear in the Scheme, (see Elements 63, 64,) they are considered as being twenty-four. These elements of syllables, then, although only twenty-nine in strictness, are laid down practically to the amount of seventy-nine. The order of the alphabet is not followed either in the Schemes or in the Principles, but an order better suited on many accounts to the purposes in view, the notice of the sounds of letters in their alphabetical order being reserved for the head of each respective division in the Dictionary.

(merth), are delicacies of pronunciation which prevail only in the more refined classes of society. Even in these classes, sur, durt, and hurd, &c., are the current pronunciation of sir, dirt, bird, &c.; and indeed in all very common words, it would be somewhat affected to insist on the delicacy referred to. It will be observed that letter i in the situation we have in view, is precisely equivalent to letter c. If the sound of i which we hear in sit, took a correspondent long sound in sir, this sound would be ē, and the word be pronounced sēr, forming with the guttural vibration the 43d element of our scheme.

36. er, er, ir, unaccented, is scarcely ever heard without some corruption of its quality in a final syllable, where the letters er, ir, or, ur, yr, will almost necessarily be pronounced ur.³⁶ This necessity is less in some words than in others;—in commerce, for instance, than in letter, and accordingly in instances like the latter, the less distinct sound of the vowel will be indicated by an italic letter. It may be mentioned in this place that bre, crc, gre, tre, as final syllables, are all deemed equivalent to ber, ter, &c. (159.)

37. or, which is equivalent to āw, occurs frequently in the language, often requiring to be distinguished from the element 47. For instance, form, (fōrm), meaning figure, must be distinguished in pronunciation from form, (fō'urm), meaning a bench: see 130.

38. or, or, unaccented, is seldom distinct; for this sound, which under the remission of accent always verges toward ur, in most cases sinks completely into it. We may be justified in saying ca'lor, stu'por, &c., with that attention to the final syllable which preserves the sound; but the same care would be pedantic or puerile in error, orator, &c.

39. ur, is the natural vowel terminating in guttural vibration.

40. ur, unaccented, differs from the preceding only by the remission of accent.

41. ārc.	It is only by being followed by guttural vibration that these sounds differ respectively from	1. ā.
42. ārc.		2. ā.
43. ērc.		3. ē.
44. ērc.		4. ē.
45. īrc.		5. ī.
46. īrc, unaccented.		6. ī, unaccented.
47. ōrc.		7. ō.
48. ōrc.		8. ō.
49. ūrc.		9. ū.
50. ūrc.		10. ū.
51. ōrc.		27. ō.
52. oor.		28. oo.
— 53		29. oi.
— 54		30. oi, unaccented.
53. ower.		31. ow.
54. ower, unaccented.		32. ow, unaccented.

³⁷ 54 The sounds terminating in guttural vibration, corresponding with 29, 30, in the opposite column, which might be expected in these vacant spaces, do not, in fact,

Identical, however, as they are, except as regards the peculiarity noticed, the practical necessity for considering them distinct elements will be perceived in the comparison of the first syllables of va-rious, se-rious, fi-ring, to-ry, fu-ry, with the first syllables of va-cant, se-cant, fi-nal, to-tal, fu-gitive: an identity of these syllables in pronunciation is decidedly provincial; the true utterance of the former is vārd-ious, sērd-ious, &c. The difference in view will be rendered intelligible to those familiar with French pronunciation, by comparing the sound of dear pronounced correctly as an English word, with that of dire pronounced correctly as a French word. In both, the vowel commences after the d precisely in the same way, but in the French word it remains pure, unmixed with the r, which begins a new syllable formed with what is called the mute e, the word being pronounced dēc-rā or nearly so; while in the English word, the sound of the r (not the trilled r as in French) blends itself with the e during its progress. So also in dear-ly, care-ful, &c., the addition of a syllable beginning with a consonant distinct from the r making no difference to the previous syllable, the r in that previous syllable blends itself with the vowel exactly as in dear, care, &c.; and the only difference between dear-ly, care-ful, &c., and va-rious, se-rious, fi-ry, to-ry, fu-ry, &c., is, that in the latter, the r, besides blending itself with the previous vowel, is also heard in the articulation of the vowel which begins the following syllable. Of this blending of the r with the previous vowel, it is further to be observed that the union is so smooth in polite utterance as to make it imperceptible where one ends, and the other begins; while in vulgar pronunciation the former vowel breaks abruptly into the guttural sound or into the vowel d used for the guttural. Among mere cocknies this substitution of d for r or ur, is a prevailing characteristic, and should be corrected by all who wish to adapt their habits to those of well-bred life. It is moreover remarkable of these elements, that each will pass on the ear either as one or two syllables, and this is signified in the schemes by the equivalent indication ā'ur, ū'ur, &c., where the mark of accent placed over the former part, gives it the appearance of the first of two syllables, while the omission of the hyphen shows that the whole is pronounced as one:³⁴ see 134.

55. The last element in our vowel scheme is a sound so short and slight as to be lost altogether in the mouth of an unpolished speaker, who says loot, joo, na'-choor, (or more commonly na'-chur), garment, kind, &c., for lute, (l'oot), jew, (j'oo), &c. On the other hand there are persons who, to distinguish them-occur in the language, the combination of letters, oir, having, with us, no sound peculiar to itself: see 132; hence, the elements numbered 53, 54, are those which come next in order.

³⁴ It has been said, there is a palpable difference between the vowel sound in payer, player, slayer, and that in care, fair, hair, share. What difference may be made in New York I know not; but I know that none is made in London, nor can be made without that peculiar effect which shows an effort to distinguish what in general is necessarily undistinguishable.

selves from the vulgar, pronounce y consonant distinctly on the occasions (see 61, 62, 63, 64, 69, 76, 77) which call for this lighter sound of y or é. This affected pronunciation (for such it certainly is) may be signified by spelling the words as follows, observing that the initial consonant letter is to be sounded, not named, and the y articulated as in the pronoun you: —l_yoot, j_yoo, na'-ch_yoor, g_yar'-ment k_yind. The affected pronunciation, be it observed, is to be avoided with as much care, as the slight sound, which in the mouth of an elegant speaker naturally slides in between the consonant and the vowel, is to be imitated.

56. h. The first element of the second scheme is, in reality, neither a vowel nor a consonant: for a vowel is an utterance of voice receiving its peculiar character from the position of the organs, two such sounds uttered in one syllable being a diphthong; and a consonant is an action of the organs of speech accompanied by breath or voice: but the element now under consideration is a breathing simply; it is a propulsion of breath, which becomes vocal in the sound that follows if this following sound being hence called aspirated. And the sound which follows is in our language always a vowel, except w and y; for w is aspirated in wheat, whig, &c., which are pronounced hwéat, hwíg, &c.; and y is aspirated in hew, hug, &c., which are pronounced hyéw, hyúg, &c. It is to be further observed that the aspirate is never heard in English, except at the beginning of syllables; and that, in the following and all their derivatives, letter h is silent; heir, honest, honour, hostler, hour, humble, and humour.⁵⁴

With respect to all the following consonants, h, i, e, a breathing, is a common material or element of those of the one sort, namely the breath consonants; and a vowel sound, oo, é, or the natural vowel, is a common element or material of all the other sort, namely, the voice consonants.

57. w, is a consonant having for its basis the most contracted of the vowel sounds, namely oo, which sound, being partially obstructed by an inward action of the lips, and then given off by an outward action, is changed from a vowel to a consonant. A comparison of the French word oui, as a Frenchman pronounces it, (viz. oo-é), with the English word we as an Englishman pronounces it, will show the difference between the vowel and the consonant. The same difference may be shown by a comparison of the phrase an oozy ditch, with the phrase a wooer. In the former the article an is properly used; in the latter the article a.

58. y, is a consonant, having for its basis the slenderest of the vowel sounds, namely é, which sound being partially obstructed by an inward action of the jaw carrying the back of the tongue against the soft palate, and then given off by an outward action, is changed, by those actions, from a vowel to a consonant. A comparison of the phrase an ear, which takes the article an, with the phrase a year, which takes the article a, will show the difference between the vowel and the consonant. This consonant enters into the composition of the element 9, namely ü; and when very slightly uttered with little of the organic action, and therefore resuming much of the character of a vowel, it is the element 55.

59. s and ss; also c or ac before e or i. This consonant consists of breath made audible in a hiss, by forcing it between the tip of the tongue and upper gum, kept in gentle contact.

60. z, zz, zt, is the same as the preceding, only that the breath is vocalized, and, instead of a hissing, is therefore a buzzing sound.

61. sh, is a consonant that consists of breath, made audible in that sort of sound by which in a whisper we require silence; to produce which, the tongue instead of touching the upper gum, as in the common dental s, is curled back in such a manner as to leave space for the breath to effuse around its sides and top. This is one of the sounds after which it is not easy to sound the consonant y in fluent union, and accordingly this last-mentioned element is, in polished pronunciation, either quite sunk after sh, or is reduced to the element 55. For example, in the word sure, where the s very irregularly has the sound sh, the sound ü loses one of its component parts, and the word is pronounced shöör. Again in the word Asia, where the s acquires the same sound, viz. sh, the i instead of that decided sound of y which we hear in spaniel, million, &c., (spán'-yél, míll'-yün), has the slighter sound which in this dictionary is marked ('). And in the frequent termination tion, where the t acquires the sound sh, the sound y, which the i by its position would represent, is entirely absorbed. It is a point of some nicety to say when the absorption of the y should be entire, and when it should not, but retain just so much of its effect as to identify with element 55; and indeed the determination one way or the other often depends on the more or less colloquial manner of the speaker. The word social for instance, is, in common discourse, pronounced sô'-shál, but with the careful utterance of measured speech, sô'-sh'ál. Thus much is certain, that where custom has not decided on the entire absorption of the sound, there is a grace in suffering it to slide lightly in.

62. zh, is the same as the foregoing, only that the breath is vocalized, and the whispered hush destroyed. No English word commences with this sound, but in French it is not uncommon at the beginning as well as at other parts of words; as in jambe, géant. Like the preceding element it does not readily take the consonant y into fluent union, and accordingly ⁵⁴ In some pronouncing dictionaries herb and hospital are included among the words whose initial h is silent; but the h may be aspirated in these and their derivatives without the least offence to polite ears; and even in humble and humour the sounding of the h is a fault, if a fault, far less glaring than it would be in heir, honest, and the other words stated above. When A begins a syllable not initial, it must nevertheless be sounded; as, in perhaps, bestest, abhor, vehement, breatheth, &c. It is only when it does not begin a syllable that it is uniformly mute; as in buhl, dahlia, ch! ah! brahma, hallesbeek, &c.

it either absorbs the y entirely, or reduces it to the slighter element (?).

63. ch, tch. This is not a simple element, although convenience requires it to be so considered. It is formed of t and sh, the 78th and 61st elements, a reference to which will stand instead of further explanation. Like the preceding two elements, it is unable to take the consonant y into fluent union, and therefore, like them, either absorbs it entirely, or reduces it to the slighter element (?).

64. j; and also g before e or i. Neither is this a simple consonant, but is formed of the same elements as the foregoing, only that these elements are vocalized, namely, t by becoming d, and sh by becoming zh. (See 79 and 62.) It is unable like the three foregoing consonants to take the consonant y into fluent union, and therefore, like them, it either absorbs the y entirely, or reduces it to the slighter element (?). Be it observed that the letter g, though generally soft before e and i, is hard in the words at 77: (the note.) On the other hand, it is soft before ao in gaol, which is much better written jail; and quite as irregularly in judgment, abridgment, &c., when so spelled; but these, in this dictionary, are written judgement, abridgement, &c. (See 196.)

65. f, ff, fe, consists of breath made audible by being forced between the upper teeth and under lip, the articulation being completed, as in all other consonants, by the separation of the organs.

66. v, ve, is the same as the foregoing, only that the breath is vocalized.

67. th, consists of breath made audible in a hiss, by forcing it between the tongue and teeth while the tip of the tongue is placed between the teeth.

68. th, the, is the same as the foregoing, only that the breath is vocalized.

69. l, ll, le, the most harmonious of the consonants, is an utterance of voice with no other organic obstruction than a contact between the tip of the tongue and the upper gum, the voice not being forced between as in z, nor kept in a murmur within the mouth as in d, but uttered as freely as the position of the organs will permit. Though the smoothest of the liquids, and readily flowing into consonant y, if the latter come in another syllable under the remission of accent, as in filial, million, bulious, valuable, (fil'-yāl, mil'-yūn, bil'-yūs, vāl'-yoo-able, &c.) (146) yet it does not allow this sound to be completed immediately after it in the same syllable. To say lüt, lū'-cid, lū'-na-tic, with the ū as perfect as in cūbe, cū'-bic, is northern, or laboriously pedantic in effect; and the practice of good society is, l'üt, l'ü'-cid, l'ü'-na-tic, &c., avoiding at the same time the vulgar extreme lüt, lū'-cid, lū'-na-tic, &c.

70. m, mm, me, is an utterance of voice through the nose while the lips are joined, the articulation being completed by separating the lips.

71. n, nn, ne, is an utterance of voice through the nose while the tip of the tongue touches the upper gum, the articulation being completed by the separation of the tongue and gum.

72. ng, is an utterance of voice through the nose while the back of the tongue touches the soft palate, the separation of the tongue and palate completing the articulation; which separation must take place without compression of the voice at the back part of the mouth; for this will be to add the sound of g, a practice common in the north-west of England, where they say king-g, lōng-g, &c., for king, lōng, &c. A comparison of sing'-er with finger, (fin'-ger), in one of which the g is not, and in the other is to be added, may render the nature of the fault plain. Let it be observed, that the sound is not a compound of n and g, but quite distinct from both; that it takes place generally when letter n is followed by g, unless the g has its soft sound as in change; and even when the g belongs to another syllable as in fin-ger, un-guent; unless that following syllable be accented as in un-god'-ly, in which case n generally preserves its proper sound. See 158. Lastly, concerning the sound under consideration, it is to be noticed that it never comes at the beginning of syllables.

73. r, rr, is an utterance of voice acted upon by a trill or trolling of the tongue against the upper gum. It entirely refuses to take y after it in the same syllable,—at least in fluent union; and the words rue, rude, brew, &c., are pronounced rōō, rōōd, brōō, &c. Even when the letter which has a claim to be sounded yōō is in the following syllable, as in vir-u-lent, er-u-dite, fer-u-la, it is not possible to give the distinct sound without pedantic effort, and an approach to the sound, signified by 'oo, (55, 28,) is all that correct utterance requires. The trill in which the utterance of this consonant element mainly consists, is often faultily produced by the back of the tongue against the soft palate: so formed, it makes the noise called the burr in the throat, a characteristic of Northumbrian pronunciation, and not unfrequent in particular places, and in many families elsewhere.—As to the smoother sound of letter r, which it takes at the end of syllables when another r or a vowel does not follow in the next, see from 33 to 54, both inclusive.

74. p, pp, pe, is an utterance of breath confined within the mouth by the close junction of the lips, and therefore quite inaudible, till the lips, by their separation, explode either the breath simply, as in up, or the breath vocalized, as in paw.

75. b, bb, be, is the same as the preceding, except that the breath kept within the mouth is vocalized, and therefore not inaudible, but heard in a murmur before the lips separate.

76. k, ck, ke; also c final, and c before a, o, u, or a consonant: to all which different modes of denoting the same element might have been added q, whose regular sound is always that of k, (see 188,) and whose place throughout the dictionary, in marking words as they are pronounced, will be supplied by k. The element which is liable to be thus variously signified is an utterance of breath confined at the soft palate by the close junction of some (successor and acceptable, for instance) than others: (See Accept and Successor in the dictionary.)

87. Similar remarks apply to many words that, if left to themselves, would probably have fallen into two significant rhythmical divisions by means of a secondary accent assisting the primary. If, for instance, we feel a propriety in saying o'igar'chy, or o'thoda'y, nee'roman'cy, &c., why may we not give the same rhythmical division to geology, theocracy, astronomy, geognosy, catastrophic, logomachy, cacophony, cacography, and the like? It might be enough to say, that, in the majority of similar words, the custom of educated speakers has determined otherwise, induced in some instances by authority derived from the original languages; in others by the predominance of the first general tendency (81) over the fourth (85.) But in these instances the principle seems to be the one investigated in 84:—for the terminations logy, cracy, graphy, gnosy, strophe, machy, ferous, metry, phony, trophy, are common to a great many words; and he who has had reading enough even in English to know this, refers each word to its class, by throwing back the accent from the common termination to the syllable introducing it, and saying geology, theocracy, orthography, calastrophe, logomachy. As to the words having the other terminations, dory, mancy, &c., all that can be said is, that they are governed by the rhythmical law, in preference to the one here spoken of. Dictionaries indeed often appear undecided with regard to words in mancy; but it is evident that either one principle or the other should direct the accentuation of the whole of them; and since the rhythmical one is fixed with regard to those in common use, the same principle should be followed in accenting the less common words.

88. It is to be observed, indeed, that whenever a general tendency is frequently crossed, through whatever cause, by words which have some characteristic in common, a rule is generated with regard to such words, by which, rather than the more general law, we are apt to be led when we meet with words of the same kind. The words satanic, pathetic, harmonic, &c., are abbreviations of, or at least are related to, satanic'al, pathetic'al, harmonic'al. Dropping the last syllable, if they retain the accent at its original seat, they become exceptive to the first general law; but the number of such words establishes a new law or tendency, namely, that words in ic shall have the accent on the previous syllable; which law we may make all words of that form obey, unless custom has previously decided otherwise; as it has in rhet'oric, arith'metic, pol'itic, &c., over which the more general law is still in force. It is further remarkable of this class of words in ic, which bear the penultimate accent, that the accented syllable is almost always short. See 93.

89. So again, the universal curtailment of ion into one syllable, by our present mode of pronouncing it, (namely shūn, 147,) has brought the numerous words of that termination out of the pale of the first general law, by which they had the antepenultimate accent, and given them a law for themselves, namely, that without exception they are to be accented on the penultimate. Of these words in ion, it must further be remembered that, if a vowel precede the common termination, the vowel, if a, e, o, or u, will be last in the previous syllable, or, in other words, will be long under the accent; as in affec't-ion, complé-tion, (though dissere't-ion, &c. will be met with, exceptively,) locomot-ion, distribú-tion; but if the vowel be i, it will not be last in the previous syllable, but will be shortened by the instantaneous junction of the consonant-sound next to it; as in recognit-ion (= recognish'-an.) See Prin. 95. Another remark concerning these words in ion may be added, namely, that when they consist of more than three syllables, (reckoning the common termination as only one,) they readily take assistance from a secondary accent.

90. There are other terminations with regard to which the same effect, or nearly the same effect, has taken place as with regard to tion; such, for instance, as in the words nau'-seate, ro'-seate, glá'-sier, confú'-sion, logid'-ian, nox'-ious, in which we find the consonant immediately preceding the liquidized vowel e or i, to have changed its original sound for that of sh or zh, (see the reason of this, 147,) and to have absorbed or almost to have absorbed the liquid e or i. Other words, as a'-theist, rega'-lia, harmoni'-ous, exhibit the same liquidizing of the e or i, and the same reduction of two syllables into one, or almost into one, (146,) although there is no change of sound in the previous consonant, nor any consequent absorption of the following vowel. These liquid terminations almost always have the accent on the syllable immediately preceding them, with a long quantity if the vowel be a, e, o, or u, with a short quantity if i or y. (See 95.) And though they cease to be under the first general law, in proportion as the last two syllables melt into one, yet the original place of the accent may be said to have been determined by that law. There can be no doubt that all words terminating in -an are, in like manner, inclined by the genius of our language to have the accent on the previous syllable, as in ce-ru'-le-an, mar-mal'-re-an, hyperbo'-re-an, Cerbe'-re-an, hercu'-le-an: but classical custom here intervenes, and accents the majority of them on the penultimate. See 86.

Syllabication.

91. The division of a word into syllables, with a view to its proper pronunciation,⁹¹ can seldom be attended with doubt, except when an accented vowel is separated from the next syllable by only one consonant-letter, or by a consonant combination not necessarily distributable into two syllables. The doubt in this case will be, whether the accented vowel-letter is, or is not, to be esteemed final in the syllable, and, consequently, is, or is not, to have that short and altered sound which an added consonant unaccompanied by an e mute produces. And note that in our language a single consonant, if it go to a former syllable, is precisely the same in effect as if it also began the next syllable: thus can-on is exactly pronounced as cannon, cal-id as callid, &c.: we have nothing of the Italian mode of doubling an articulation orally. A speaker, then, with regard to the syllabication of words, may say appa'-rent or appar'-ent, sa'-crament or sac'-rament, pa'-tron or pat'-ron; nor can the doubt be removed by any general rule, since, in this as in other cases, any statement that may be laid down in the shape of a law is liable to so many exceptions, as leaves the point after all in possession of mere usage; for the ascertaining of which the dictionary must be consulted. It belongs, however, to this department of the work to state, as under the foregoing head, such general tendencies as can be ascertained, liable as they are, even to a greater degree than the laws for the seat of accent, to be crossed and thwarted by accidental causes.

92. With regard, then, to the case in question, namely, an accented vowel separated from the next syllable by only one consonant, or by a consonant combination not necessarily distributable into two syllables, the general rule or tendency of the language is, that the consonant or consonants go to the following syllable if the vowel is in the penultimate,—in other words, accent makes, if possible, a penultimate syllable long. But the consonant, or one of the consonants, goes to the former syllable, if the vowel (unless that vowel be u) is further back than the penultimate,—in other words accent tends to shorten all vowels except u, when further back than the penultimate. For instance, it is the tendency of the language to say appa'-rent, rather than appar'-ent, and pa'-tron, than pat'-ron; but con'-ical rather than co'-nical, and sac'-rament than sa'-crament. And the rule applies to syllables under a secondary as under the primary accent, as in dem'-onstra'-tion, sem'-atol'-ogy.⁹²

93. So numerous, however, are the instances

in which the penultimate syllable is short under the accent, that, if we acknowledge its original tendency to be long, we must also acknowledge the existence of causes that frequently counteract that tendency, independently of caprice affecting particular words. It should seem, for example, that the termination ic, is, in many instances, an abbreviation of ical; e. g. gener'ic is shortened or seems to be shortened from gener'ical. Now, as in gener'ical, the antepenultimate accent shortens the vowel according to the general law, (92,) so when the word is shortened, the short accented vowel remains; and this practice taking place in many similar words, a law or tendency arises to shorten the penultimate syllable of words in ic.

94. Other words having the penultimate accent, though not abbreviated from originals in our own language, are shortened from correspondent words in Latin: e. g. rap'-id from rap'idus, doc'ile from doc'ilis, al'-om from al'-omus, hab'-it from hab'itus, &c. And not only do we preserve in the English abbreviations the short sound we are accustomed to give in the first syllable of the Latin words, but the practice generates a rule or tendency for all words of similar form or origin; as frig'id, fel'-id, deb'-ile, spir'-it, &c. from frigidus, fel'idus, deb'ilis, spir'itus, &c. So likewise we have proc'-es in spite of the alphabetical o in the verb To proceed. The truth is, that while the rules belonging to the classical languages are often suffered, in single instances, to interfere with the tendencies of our own, the tendencies of our own, on the other hand, as frequently affect our pronunciation of Latin. Thus a schoolboy is generally allowed to say Nom. La'-pis, Gen. Lap'-idis, &c. Nom. No'-men, Gen. Nom'-inis, &c., regardless of the Latin quantities in lāpis, and nōminis, and guided only by the lengthening tendency of the penultimate accent, and the shortening power of the antepenultimate in our own language.⁹⁴ This inattention to every thing but the seat of the accent is quite justifiable as regards English prosody; since with us an accented is always, for prosodical purposes, a long syllable, and an unaccented one short; (e. g. whether we say lap'-is or la'-pis, no'-men or nom'-en, the words will be what are deemed trochees in English.) It is easy to see then that in the syllabication of la'-pis as an English word, of misand'-mer, of lap'-idist or lap'idary, of nom'-inal, &c., we are guided by our own general law, since that law is apt to interfere even when we pronounce Latin; and equally plain is it that short and long in Latin should not, as indeed they do not in general, influence the syllabication of words in English: for to our prosody it would make no difference if we said lap'-is, instead of la'-pie, ⁹⁴ At the Charter-house they are free from this negligence, and perhaps at many other places since the example has been set. No doubt the change is an improvement. But if it be supposed that at the Charter-house, or elsewhere, in consequence of this change, they have succeeded in recovering the rhythm of ancient Rome or Athens, it may be safely said the supposition is grounded on mistake. See 175.

and no'-minal instead of nom'-inal. Yet, in particular instances, there can be little doubt that the short quantity of the first syllable in Latin has been regarded in determining the pronunciation of the word in English; for instance, in phat'-aux, ten'-or, sat'-yr. But in de'-tor (to give one example for many) our own idiom predominates, and makes the penultimate long in spite of the short vowel in Latin, in our English pronunciation of which the short vowel is, in fact, almost always made long. In dram'-a, on the other hand, the first syllable is short in English, though long in the original languages. Yet, even in pronouncing it as a Latin word, most English tongues, although they say dra'-ma in the nominative case, pronounce dram'-atis, dram'-ata, &c. in the oblique cases; and the English word drama seems to have received its pronunciation from these.

95. With regard to words that have, or that had, their accent higher than the penultimate, we may also expect other and wider causes of non-compliance with the general law, than mere caprice affecting individual words. We shall find, for instance, that if the concluding syllables of a word flow so liquidly into each other, as to produce a doubt whether they are two syllables or only one, the tendency of the language is, to give the consonant to the latter part of the word, and leave the vowel-letter of the preceding accented syllable in its long alphabetical sound, unless that vowel-letter be i. Examples, a'-li-en, na'-tion, de'-vi-ate, o'-lio, de'-bi-ous; but am-bi'-ion, bi'-i-ous, id'-i-ot, &c. Yet even with regard to a, e, o, and u, under the circumstance in view, the general rule sometimes vindicates its way; as in com-pa'-i-on, glad'-i-ate, battal'-i-on, gof'-e-ous, re-bu'-i-ate, val'-i-ant, gym-nas'-i-um, impet'-u-ous, dis-cres'-i-on, on'-i-on, (the on in which last word is pronounced as un.) The truth is, however, that the two concluding syllables of all such words are in pronunciation only one; by which oral shortening, those of them which were exceptive to the general law are brought within its pale, while those which were not exceptive are thrown out of it. Thus na'-tion adhe'-sion, no'-tion, fa'-sion, &c., have the accented vowel long, agreeably, it may be said, to the general effect of the penultimate accent, while vis'-ion, ambif'-ion, vic'-ious, &c. have their accented vowel short, and thus form another and a large class of exceptions to that general rule.

96. The tendency of accent to shorten all the vowel-letters but u, when further back than the penultimate, will also generally fail of its effect in derivative words that previously had the vowel long. For instance, a, e, i, and o, remain long in bla'-mable, de'-cency, br'-bery, po'-tentate, on account of their relationship to blame, de-cent, bribe, and po-tent; though such relationship does not always avail against the contrary tendency; for the a, which is long in na'-ture and na'-tion, is short in na'-tural and na'-tional; and it is with difficulty that pa'-tronage, however related to pa'-tron, is restrained from becoming pa'-ronage.

The laws (as far as any can be said to exist) which determine the seat of accent, and the assignment of a consonant in pronunciation to its proper syllable, having thus been investigated, we are now to proceed with such further rules for the sounds of letters as are not included in the two schemes, and the corresponding sections that immediately follow them.

Rules for the less regular sounds of Letters.

Since almost all the general rules are implied in what has preceded, the following statements are to be considered supplemental or exceptive:—The order of the schemes will be regarded as far as can conveniently be done.

97. Letter a, as sounded in the last syllable of the childish words papa, mamma, is irregular, and the practice of so sounding it when final in an accented syllable is scarcely carried farther in words purely English. A-y, baa, ha! and some words of a similar kind, must however be placed among these exceptive examples. For the still broader sound of a in wa-ter, a reason is given hereafter. (140.) Even in Italian words, if not of recent adoption, and in the Italian names of Shakespeare's plays, the best practice is to use the English a; particularly when the orthography has been in any degree changed, as in innamorato, from the Italian innamorato. The same may be said of accented a before a consonant and final e mute:—to this part of the rule the word gape used to be an exception, but among very good speakers is an exception no longer. As to have (see 189) and are, they are pronounced as if spelled without the final e; and so is the participle bade, under the influence of a principle to be noted hereafter. (135.) Some people pronounce the plural of stave (staves) with the Italian a, but the practice is not general. Male in some compounds, as Male-administration, is pronounced and often written mal.

98. But when a, final in a syllable, is unaccented, its alphabetical sound occurs by exception only, and not by any general rule; for the general rule is to sound it d. (24.) Accordingly, it is only in a few words, generally where diæresis occurs, that the a unaccented is pronounced alphabetically. See these exceptions more particularly indicated in the note. (*)

99. As to unaccented a, when followed by a consonant and final e mute, or by any vowel which usually keeps it long, although in the majority of cases an elegant pronunciation will retain the a in its alphabetical sound, yet in some words of very common occurrence there would be pedantry in scrupulously avoiding the short and easier sounds which the organs are inclined to adopt. For instance, in cabbage, courage, palace, furnace, &c., although the a in the last syllable may be marked â, yet the shortening of this sound brings it to ê (see 13,) and this again easily slides into ï or â, so that for common pronunciation the words might be marked căb'-hidge, cür'-ridge, păl'-lăse, fur'-niss. In the same manner the final syllables of cǎp'-tǎn, vîl'-lân, easily shorten so as to reduce the words to cǎp'-tîn, vîl'-lîn, &c.⁹⁹

100. The digraphs ai, ay, ex, ei, ea, ec, ao, and aw, are all either regularly or irregularly sounded â. By regularly is meant that there are more words in which the combination has the sound â, than words in which it has any other sound; by irregularly is meant, either that the combination has some other sound more frequently, or that it seldom occurs, and consequently is an unusual way of indicating the sound. The first two combinations are given in the scheme as among the usual ways of indicating the sound â or â, and in spelling words as they are pronounced, these as well as the others will be used; but none beyond these. In the very irregular orthography of our language, however, these are far from being the only circumstances or the only characters under which the sound in question occurs. Those irregular forms which are not noticed here, will occur for notice under other rules. It is sufficient to state in this place that the combination ey, when under the accent, is also regularly sounded â, as in thy, prey, &c.; but that the other five digraphs, which, standing at the head of this section, are not printed in capitals, are to be considered irregular indications of the sound. The first of these, however, namely ei, takes the sound â so often, that it is almost its regular sound: e. g. in veil, vein, deign, weight, heir, &c.:—the second, ea, takes it in some words of very common occurrence; as in great, steak, break, bear, pear, to wear, to wear, to fear; also in fan-sant, the law adaptation of faisant: the third takes it in e'er and ne'er, contractions for ever and never; the fourth takes it in gaol, the only word in which the combination occurs, which word, moreover, is much better written jail; and the fifth takes it only in the word gaug.

101. Letter e final in a syllable is always sounded regularly when sounded at all, but no letter in the language is so frequently mute. In the unaccented syllables of able, idle, ruffle, tackle, ripple, rattle, drizzle, it seems to answer no other purpose than to keep the syllable in countenance, a syllable indeed without a vowel except to the eye.¹⁰¹ At other times the letter though mute is not without effect; (see 171;) and even when without effect it must not in every case be deemed an irregularity. (See 189.) There is reason to think that, in the original pronunciation of the language, final e was not so often a mute letter, but had its proper sound in that as in other situations. At present, the irregularity lies not in sinking but in sounding it. Scarcely in any word purely English is it sounded when it comes last. The chief exceptions are words that come without alteration from the classical languages, as epi'o-me, rec'i-pe, sim'i-le; though even here we meet with words that conform to our own practice, as bubonucle, hydrocele, and all other words compounded with the Greek word cele, (ke-le), a tumor. Of those classical words that sound the final e, it is to be observed, that not only do they retain its sound in the plural, but they refuse to have that shortened sound which we hear in alleys, valleys, beauties, (al'-lîz, &c.), and require a certain prolongation, which gives them a very different effect from ordinary English words: for instance, antipodes, manes, sound the final syllable êz. This, however, is further to be remarked, that if the word should be an English adaptation of a classical word,—e. g. satellite from the Latin satelles,—as the singular must be sounded according to common rules, so likewise must the plural; though the English word satellites happening to identify in spelling with the Latin plural, Pope has taken the liberty in one of his lines to pronounce it as a Latin word. In our language the regular way of signifying the sound ê in a final syllable is by the letter y either alone, as in truly, or along with the letter c, as in gal'-ley. The last mode will be adopted throughout the dictionary in spelling words as they are pronounced. With regard to mute e after r in certain unaccented syllables see 159.

102. Letter e followed by a consonant and final e mute is irregular in there, where, ere, and were; and also in allege, college, sacrilege, privilege. The last words, if custom would permit, ought to be spelled as they are pronounced, alledge, colledge, sacriledge, and priviledge.

103. The digraphs taking the sound ê are ex, ea, ei, æ, ai, ie, co, ey, ay; and taking the unaccented sound, namely ê, are ex, ia, uy. The first of these, ee, is sounded ê, with scarcely any exception; the next, ea, has other sounds and particularly ê; but ê is its usual sound; the next, ei, though very frequently sounded â, (100,) is still more frequently sounded ê, as in seize, cei-ling, deceit, &c.; the next two, æ and æ, are found only in classical words, as Cæsar, ædile, fætus, which it has been recommended to spell as English words with plain e; ai has the sound e in demain; the next, ie, although its regular sound is î, (106,) takes that of ê in several words, as pronouncing dictionary, acting on this received definition, annexes all such consonant combinations as drop the sound of their vowel to the syllable standing next them, and so to the eye sweeps away a syllable. Would it not have been better to reject the definition than to support it by what is only an apparent conformity? The definition states an untruth: a consonant can be uttered without any sound but its own, however obscure, be it of the voice or breath, that murmured sound may be. A-ble, e-vil, ma-son, bro-ken, &c., although heard with only one vowel, are as manifestly two syllables to the ear (all our poetry proves it) as any disyllables in the language.

⁹⁹ To mark these vague and fluctuating differences accurately would be a vain pretence. To exhibit that pronunciation which belongs to familiar and consequently negligent utterance, is surely improper in a dictionary which pretends to furnish the standard sounds of words. Something must after all be left to circumstances; and if, where circumstances may and generally do corrupt the distinct sound of a letter, an italic character is given as a hint of that liability, or a reference is made to such remarks in the principles as the present, it is presumed that as much will have been done as the exigency permits.

¹⁰¹ A consonant is commonly defined, a letter that cannot be sounded without a vowel. Sheridan, in his

grief, field, fend, reverie, &c.; the next three, oo, ey, ay, have the sound ō only in people, key, ley, egypt, and quay. But when the combination ey is unaccented its regular sound is ē; (see the concluding part of 101.) The next combination, ia, takes the sound ē in parliament, miniature, because the words, originally pronounced in four syllables, have in the currency of discourse dropped the third; and the last, uy, in pla-guy, ro-guy, &c., occurs in consequence of retaining the silent u in order to keep the g hard.

104. Letter i or y under the accent, and final in a syllable, or followed by a consonant and e mute, is irregular in no word purely English except the verbs to live and to give, (see 189,) and the noun shire; but there are several semi-French and other foreign words in which the French sound of i is retained; as marine, police, profile, &c.: to which are to be added such words as are noticed at the conclusion of section 115. The word oblige, which formerly classed with marine, &c., is now pronounced regularly.

105. But when i or y final in a syllable or followed by a consonant and final e mute is unaccented, it resigns its alphabetical sound so generally, that its proper, can no longer be called its usual sound in that situation; and i-magine, y-cleped, pi-azza, li-tigious, hy-po-crisis, ci-vil-i-ty, ti-mid-i-ty, servile, practice, treatise, respite, favourite, genuine, opposite, which are pronounced ē-magin, ē-cleped, pē-azza, &c., servil, practis, treatis, respit, &c., are specimens of the usual way in which all similar words are sounded; to which the instances referred to at (*) are exceptive. According to this special rule, unaccented i may be said to be sounded regularly when it follows these examples; but as this is not its regular sound according to the more general rules of pronunciation, so throughout the dictionary, whenever in a subjected word letter i drops its alphabetical sound, and like the foregoing examples takes that of ē or i, it is printed in italic.

106. The digraphs taking the sound ī, are ix, xi; ei, ui, uy, ai, ay, ey, eye, oi. The first of these, ie, though often sounded ē, has ī for its regular sound, and ye, its equivalent, has the same sound regularly, as in dye. The third in the list, ei, has two other sounds, both more frequent than ī; (103, 100;) which sound it takes only in height, heigh-ho, and sleight, unless we add either and neither; but usage as well as regularity favours the sound ē in these two words; the fourth, ui, occurs in guide, guile, &c., where it is evident that the u is inserted merely to keep the g hard, as it is likewise in the proper name, Guy. There is not the same reason for the insertion of the silent u in buy; but it is easy to see how the use of the digraph in some instances might have led to its adoption in others where the sound was the same. The digraph ai, has the sound ī only in the word aile; the next digraph in the list, ay, is a single word, and is pronounced āē, which is not quite, but very nearly identical with ī, (5;) but aye signifying ever is pronounced regularly, that is āē. The next digraph, ey, is heard in eyas; and the next, eye, is a single word, and classes with no other; which is to be observed also of the very irregular word choir, in which oi are sounded ī.

107. Letter o final in a syllable, or followed by a consonant and e mute, resigns in so many instances its alphabetical sound, that the general rule becomes doubtful till the exceptions are ascertained. Do, to, two, and who, prove, move, behave, (properly written behoove,) and lose, are words in such common use, and are the parents of so many derivatives, that the sound ō seems almost as proper to the letter o as its alphabetic sound; and hence it was formerly used without scruple in many words where modern practice has discontinued it; as in dome, Rome, and gold. Still we pronounce the word bosom with the contracted sound, where, however, the best practice is to shorten it into ō; and the same pronunciation we give to the o in woman, changing the sound ō in the plural of the word into ī. In gamboge, the long sound of the same vowel is fixed; and in whore, though the same sound of the vowel is by no means universal or even common, yet it is sanctioned by good authority, and may be adopted, so Walker says, when we wish to soften the coarse effect of a coarse word. Thus much for the proneness of o to be sounded ō. But the liability of this letter to take the sound ū is still greater, affecting it both in situations where we might expect it to be sounded ō, as in some, and in those where it would be regularly sounded ō. (116.) The words dove, love, glove, shove, and above, where it has the sound ū, stand in curious contrast with grōve, clōve, rōve, &c., on the one hand, and with prove, move, &c., (prōv, &c.) on the other. As for gōne, shōne, trōde, which merely drop the mute e, their contraction comes under the sanction of a general principle, (135,) and so likewise does that of done, the change in whose vowel-sound, namely of ō into ū, supposing the shortening into ō to have previously taken place, is common to many other words. (116.) The word one is another irregularity, but not wholly unaccountable, (141,) and come and some (cūm, sūm) are two more anomalies. In all these instances the change of sound occurs under the accent. It is less remarkable that the o in purpose should, through the frequent occurrence of the word, and the absence of accent from the syllable, have sunk into the natural vowel, or that stone, as a common termination in touchstone, limestone, &c., should incline to be sounded stūn; but the caprice of custom can alone account for the discordant spelling and pronunciation of pedagōgue, demagōgue, dialōgue, &c., in which ue are not only wholly silent but wholly useless.

108. The combinations taking the sound ō, are oa, oe, ou, ow; eo, ew, eau, au, oo. The first, oe, has ō for its regular sound, and is a very common way by which the sound is denoted in the language; as in boat, coat, &c. The second, oe, has likewise ō for its regular sound in words purely English, as doe, Joe, &c.; under the form œ in adopted Latin words, it is an equivalent for letter e, where, indeed, this letter ought to take its place. (103.) The next two, ou, and ow, whose regular sound is the 31st element in the scheme, are nevertheless to be conceived regularly sounded in soul, moulder, four, pour, &c., follow, hollow, &c.; the u or w in such words being esteemed mute.¹⁰⁸ Of the remaining combinations, eo, ew, eam, and oo, the first is sounded ō only in yeoman and its compounds; the second only in sew, and sewer; the third in bureau, beau, and its compounds; and the fourth only in brooch, door, and floor.

109. Letter u final in a syllable, or followed by a consonant and e mute, loses its alphabetical sound on many occasions owing to the peculiar organic composition of that sound, (9,) and the difficulty of preserving it entire in connection with certain other sounds. By referring to principles 61, 62, 63, 64, 69, and 73, it will be seen why the letter u is not regularly sounded in sure, (shūr), pleasure, (plēzh'oor), nature, (nā'-ch'oor), jaw, (j'wō), lute, (l'wōt), rude, (rōdd), &c.¹⁰⁹ The same principles do not account for the great irregularity of bury and business, but the nature of the sound u in some degree explains it. In the frequent use of the words, and the attempts at rapid utterance, the last part of the sound u was dropped: this reduced the words to a pronunciation bordering on bē-ry and bē-siness, which at length was further shortened into bēr-ry and biz-iness. The shortening of the unaccented sound into ī in the last syllable of lettuce, and of min'-ute, is explicable in the same manner. In the verb to conjure, with the accent on the first, the last syllable is pronounced as if the e were absent.

110. The combinations taking the sound ū are ue, ui, zu, zw; ieu, euu, eo, iew. The first four of these have ū for their regular sound; as in cue, suit, feud, new, &c.; the fifth, ieu, has the sound in adieu; the sixth has it in beauty and all its compounds; the seventh in food and compounds, better written feud, &c., and the eighth in view. In some words the digraph ue is quite idle. See 107 and 189.

111. Pursuing the order of the scheme, we come next to vowels which are rendered short by the effect of consonants that follow them.

¹⁰⁸ When, however, ou or ow, being sounded ō or ō, occurs in a subjected word in the dictionary, in order to distinguish it from the same digraph, sounded as in noon and now, it is printed, as all letters that take irregular sounds, in italics; while ou, ow, sounded as in the last two instances, retain the Roman character.

¹⁰⁹ Webster goes much further than I do, and denies that u, as in union, unite, is preserved entire in such words as cube, abuse, dearable, human. I know not the practice of New York, but I am confident that in London, among all speakers above the vulgar, the u has the same sound in all these words, with the sole difference of remitted accent, and shorter quantity in unite, and of added guttural vibration in dearable. It is true our vulgar say deorable, toob, (tube), doo-ty, (duty), nuo, (new), &c., but even they preserve the alphabetic u in the other instances given above. Webster says that when he was in England, "he was particularly attentive to the public speakers in regard to this point, and was happy to find that very few of them made the distinction here mentioned,"—that is, made a difference between u in cube, and u in rude.—Credat Yanhaws.

The vowel-letters, as we have seen, are not short before a consonant if e mute is added: the reason of which is, that the e was originally sounded, and made with the consonant a distinct syllable, leaving the previous vowel final in the foregoing syllable. Thus, too, the vowel is long in chaste, taste, &c., because the words were originally chā-ste, tā-ste, &c.:—so likewise in bathe, &c., because the consonant is double only to the eye. But the long vowel in change, strange, &c., and in ancient, angel, chamber, ambs-ace, Cambridge, and cambric, is clearly irregular. The long and broader sound of a, namely ā, which many speakers use in plant, ass, fast, castle, basket, master, &c., is likewise irregular, and is daily growing less prevalent in well-bred society. (23.) Before th, however, except in kath, rath, rather, gather, lather, fathom, mathematics, the long broader sound universally prevails; as in path, lath, futher, &c., and likewise before lf, lv, and lm, the l being silent. (139.)

112. But the chief defection of letter a from its short sound before a consonant, occurs in words where, dispensing with the significant w, it is nevertheless sounded ā. This takes place in all, ball, &c., (excepting only skall, and the name of the street Pall-mall, which, they say, is derived from pellere malleo, to strike with a mallet, and is pronounced as if written pell-mell;)—in always, thralldom, and all words in which the digraph ll was formerly used; in uppal, as being confounded with such words; in talk, fulcon, &c.; in salt, mall, &c.; (though in these the sound is generally shortened into ō, and will be marked not ā, but āw: see 25;) in bald, scald, &c.; in pal'sy, pulter, paltry, &c., and generally in words where the l is followed in the same syllable by another l, or by any other consonant-letter whose sound does not bring the lips nearly or quite into contact, or draw out the mouth at the corners. (See 142.) In halm and shalm the lips are brought into contact, and the words would doubtless have been pronounced correspondently with balm, if the spelling had always been uniform; but they are likewise spelled hawn and shawm, which latter spelling, and not the former, determines their pronunciation. The letter a is likewise liable, in general, to its broad sound, when it is preceded by a letter sounded as consonant w, whether the letter w is present or not; as in wan, was, swab, wanton, watch, quantity, quality, &c.; which are sounded, wōn, wōz, &c., (140,) provided (as with regard to vowels affected by l) no consonant follows which brings the lips together, or draws out the corners of the mouth. (142.) The words to chap, a chap, and chaps, where letter a is fixed in the sound ō, are irregular on no assignable grounds. In scallop, the double l explains, though it does not justify, the broad sound of the same letter. In chap, chaps, (the jaw or jaws,) the broad sound is a confirmed irregularity:—in the verb to chap, to break into clefts, and the substantive, a chap, derived from it, the irregularity has for some time been less prevalent, and a speaker may pronounce them regularly without seeming pedantic.

113. The regular short sound of e before a consonant seldom fails in an accented syllable. Yet custom has substituted the sound i for e in the musical term clef, in English, and in pretty. But when not under the accent, although the preservation of the distinct regular sound is an elegance in the pronunciation of many words, (14,) yet in others, where there is a tendency toward the sound i, there would be stiffness and pedantry in scrupulously adhering to regularity; for instance, whenever letter e makes an additional syllable with s in forming the plural, or the genitives of nouns, or the third person of verbs; as in box-es, fa-ces, Geor-ge's, he practis-es, he debu-ss-es. In all such instances, the e may very properly be sounded i, as it may likewise in the last syllable of helmet, poet, linen, covel, &c., although marked in the dictionary for its regular sound.

114. But before d, l, and n, in a final unaccented syllable, e is very frequently sunk entirely; as is likewise i in a few words before l and n; (115 towards the end;) and o very generally before n. (116 at the end.) The following are specimens of words in which this kind of suppression occurs: Wronged, praised, caged, smoothed, called, formed, planned, barred, stabbed, plagued; fabled, sparkled, handled, baffled; stuffed, (stuff, 143,) backed, kicked, tripped, faced, dressed, rushed; grovel, weasel; evil, devil; bidden, sudden, golden, lessen, heaven, chosen, strengthen, hasten, denizen; basin, coffin, raisin; bacon, beckon, pardon, reason, mason, lessen. Nay, the irregularity extends to the words victual and Britan, as if they had been written vit-tel and Brit-en, and then corrupted in sound as the previous words. Alluding to such suppression of the vowel in the final syllable of some words, and its preservation in others, Walker says that "nothing is so vulgar and childish as to hear swivel and heaven with the e distinct, and novel and chicken with e suppressed." Either the remark is a little extravagant, or our prejudices are grown a little more reasonable since it was written. Still it is true that we cannot oppose the polite and well-bred in these small matters, without some detraction from their favourable opinion; and the inquiry when we are to suppress the vowel in these situations and when we are not, will therefore deserve the best answer it is capable of. The suppression, then, of e before d, takes place in verbs on all occasions when it can take place; it cannot take place in afforded, wanted, &c. because the sound of the e is necessary to that of the d; but in followed, blamed, dressed, placed, taxed, &c., however harsh may be the clustered consonants in consequence of the omission, yet the omission is indispensable, if we desire to conform to customary pronunciation. How far this conformity is desirable in the public reading of the Scriptures, or of set forms of prayer couched in language venerable for its antiquity, is another question; though even here, it is presumed, few judicious readers would go so far as to say burri-éd, stray-éd, justi-f-éd, set-tl-éd, and assem-bl-éd. In adjectives, on the other hand, unless they are participles as well as adjectives, the almost uniform practice is to preserve the sound of e before d, as in naked, wicked, ragged, wretched, &c. This will explain the two different ways of sounding the adjective picked: for in the phrase a picked point, the adjective is not related to any verb, and therefore sounds the e; but when we say, a hundred picked men, the same spelled word is related to the verb to pick, and therefore sinks the e. It is true that according to this rule we ought to sink the e in the adjectives of the following phrases, a blessed day, a learned man, a cursed thought; yet custom, ever capricious, makes them exceptions, and sounds the e. It is further to be observed that, in the compounding of words, both the original and the exceptive principle relax in favour of a more current or more harmonious pronunciation. Thus though we say, an aged horse, with the e sounded, yet we say a full-aged horse with the e sunk; on the other hand, though we say, an amazed look, with the e sunk, yet we say amazedly and amazedness, with the e sounded. With regard, in the next place, to the suppression of e before l in a final unaccented syllable, the practice, where it does occur, is an exception rather than a rule, it being the custom of good speakers to guard against it, except in shek'-el, ha'-zel, cri'-zel, ea'-sel, na'-vel, ra'-el, sniv'-el, shriv'-el, swiv'-el, driv'-el, shov'-el, grov'-el, cha'-el, which, as to the last syllable, are pronounced in the same manner as the last syllable of tackle, dazzle, &c. (101.) Lastly, with regard to the suppression of e before n, unfortunately for the euphony of our language, it takes place by rule, as it should seem, rather than by exception; for though after a liquid (except in fallen, stolen, and swollen) the sound is always preserved, as in sullen, flamen, linen, barren; yet, when any other consonant precedes, usage has hitherto been, and is still, averse to the sound of the e, except in sudden, kitchen, hyphen, chicken, ticken, jerkin, aspen, marten, leven, sloven, pattens, millens, and one or two other words in less common use; taking no offence at the ugly combinations of sound which occur in all other similar words, such for instance as, dead'n, madd'n, gold'n, black'n, oak'n, ta-k'n, sick'n, sha-p'n, lea-s'n, kitt'n, heav'n, ra-v'n, &c., which are but a small sample of the numerous words in the language, that, terminating in en, come under the rule; and when to these we add such as, terminating in in and on, sink the vowel in the same manner, as ba-d'n, cosu'n, ba-c'n, rear'n, &c., it will be seen that the blemish, if a blemish it is, extends over no limited space in the language.¹¹⁴

115. The regular short sound of i before a consonant generally gives place to the long

sound before ld and nd, (compare 138,) as in child, mild, &c., find, kind, &c., which are pronounced as if written chiled, miled, &c., fined, kined, &c., sinking the e as in the pronunciation of the participles of verbs. But this exceptive principle does not include even all purely English words, e. g. guilt, wind, where the i is regular; and much less such as are of recent classical origin, as abscond, rescind. Neither should it include the title Childe, which we may suppose to have once been Chil'-de. The regular short sound of i also fails in sign, &c., where the g is silent, (157,) in high, sight, &c., where gh are silent, (162,) and in the individual words indict, (the last syllable,) isle, island, viscount, in all of which the following letter being silent, accounts in some degree for the irregularity. (139.) The long sound of i in Christ, in climb, and in pint, are less explicable on any principle derived from the practice of our own language. In tithe, blithe, &c. the i is properly lengthened by the e mute, for th, though double to the eye, is a single consonant to the ear. In unaccented syllables the only failure of the sound is in evil, devil, raisins, basin, and cousin, in which it is quite sunk; (114;) but the practice as to letter i extends no further except in mean society: Lat'in and pu-p'l, for instance, instead of Lat-in and pu-pli, are decided vulgarisms. The irregular sound of i and y, in squirrel and panegyric, we may hope in time to hear reclaimed, a correspondent reformation having taken place in spirit and miracle, which were once, but are not now, pronounced spér-rit, and mêr-racle. Sir-up, still pronounced sür'-rup, may be sounded regularly without pedantry. Bombasin, palanquin, Brazil, glacis, &c. have the i pronounced é, because in fact they class with antique, profile, &c., (104,) and still keep in part their foreign pronunciation.

116. The defection of letter o from its regular short sound appears in many and various instances. Some cases of this kind we might expect from the proneness of o to be sounded ö, where we might look for its regular alphabetic sound. (107.) Hence we are prepared for the short sound of oo in wom-an, bos-om, Wolf, Wolsley, Wolverhampton. In the first syllable of Worcester and worsted, the vowel sound, irregular in the same way, terminates in guttural vibration, and, being in this manner prevented from shortening, identifies with ö. (130.) Passing from these instances we come to host, post, most, ghost, &c., which instead of having the regular short sound as heard in cöst, fröst, töst, löst, are pronounced with o in its long or alphabetical sound; perhaps because they were once pronounced in two syllables in correspondence with their old spelling hos-te, pos-te, &c. Yet this cannot be the reason that gröss deviates from the regular sound which we hear in möss, cröss, dröss, &c. As to the lengthened sound which some speakers give the vowel in these last instances, (e. g. māwss, crāwss, &c.)—since the lengthening does not change the specific nature of the vowel, we do not notice it here. (See 17.)

Again, when o is followed by ll, ld, lk, and lt, its defection from its short into its alphabetical sound is so frequent, that döll, löll, &c. seem less regular than röll, dröll, tröll, stroll, öld, böld, göld, yölk, cöll, döll, &c.; and this prevalence of the long sound before l extends to many words in which the l is single, as in bol-ster, para-söl, pal-röl. A cause for this long sound of o before l is endeavoured to be assigned at 138. Yet in other words the same lengthening and change of sound takes place in o where no cause can be assigned, as in both and comb: while in tomb and womb the change is not into ö but into ö. The alphabetic ö in pört, fört, förm, (a bench,) förge, pörch, hörde, &c., as it is not a deviation from ö, but äw, is noticed in another place. (130.) But these are not all the ways in which o deviates from its regular short sound: it very frequently takes, not its own short sound, but ü. This may in some degree be accounted for when preceded by the sound of w, (see 141,) as in won, wonder, worry, once, and once, (i. e. won, wonce;) but is less explicable on any general principle in other instances, such as combat, constable, borough, shovel, cozen, doth, brother, &c. In most of such instances it is impossible to use the regular sound without offence to ears habituated to the usual sounds, though the force of the more general rule will now and then detach a straggler, and if the word frequently occurs, reduce it at last to regularity. There was a time when sovereign and comrade were always pronounced with the o as short u; but since the former word has been the name of a current coin, the regular sound of the o has been getting into use, and bids fair to be completely established. The word comy belongs to this class; but in slow solemn utterance may have the regular sound of o. These observations have all had reference to accented syllables. Letter o, unaccented and followed by a consonant without e mute, always tends to be sounded ü; (see 18;) and in final syllables either takes this sound entirely, as in sexton, horizon, felon, demon, unison, &c., or is sunk entirely, as in bacen, reason, poison, prison, &c.

117. The regular short sound of u before a consonant fails in bull, full, pull, and all their derivatives, and in many words, not really derivatives, but appearing to be so; viz. bullace, bullet, bulwark, bullion, fuller, fullage, fullery, Fulham, pulpit, pullet. In all these words, u has the sound ö, as it had in many words now obsolete, and still has in butcher, puss, pudding, cushion, cushat, sugar, cuckoo, huzzar, husza! hurrah! push, bush, and in the verb to put; but not in the substantive put, the name of a game at cards, or applied in derision to a countryman. Among these words we must be careful not to mix any of classical derivation, as fulsome, and fulminate; but confine the sound to the few words noted above, and to their compounds.

118. The sound which, in spelling words as they are pronounced, will be indicated by ö, appears, from the preceding section, to have been one of two short sounds appertaining to the letter u; and there is reason to think it was formerly much more prevalent in the language than it is now. Hence a doubt might at that time have existed, which of the two should be deemed its regular short sound. That doubt, however, can exist no longer. The latter sound under the character u occurs in so few primitive words as the language is now pronounced in good society, that it is clearly an irregular sound compared with that we hear in dull, gull, but, hush, &c. The sound, then, appears to have no regular mark of indication in the ordinary spelling of our language: for the regular sound of the digraph oo, though identical in quality, is essentially a long sound, while that which is indicated by these letters in a few words of the language is essentially short. Nor are the words exceptive under any general principle, save those only in which oo are followed by k, which consonant uniformly shortens the sound; as in book, look, took, &c. The other words in which the short sound is denoted by the letters oo in the ordinary spelling of the language are wool, wood, good, hood, stood, foot, and their compounds; to which we may add soot; for though this word, probably from being confounded with those which are spelled with u, long exhibited the anomaly of being pronounced sût, it is now, by the best speakers, classed with the words preceding it. Cooper and its compounds are doubtful, except in common speech, which, in London at least, invariably shortens them. Blood and flood not only shorten the vowel, but change it into û, with little chance of regaining the more consistent short sound: so also does and doth, originally pronounced dôôz and dôôth, are now sounded dûz and dûth; which changes appear to have arisen from confounding these with words that, being spelled with u, renounce the more ancient short sound of that letter, in order to take the other short sound, now considered the regular one. But would, could, and should, although they shorten their original vowel sound, do not change it for another. See 127.

119. The practice of sometimes shortening the long sound of a vowel combination into the sound identical in quality is not peculiar to the digraph oo, but occurs with other combinations. Thus the sound â in said, saith, says, again, against, is shortened amongst the best speakers into the identical sound ê. (13.) Thus the sound ae in the last syllable of forfeit, surfeit, foreign, &c., in been, in breeches, in dignities, cities, envies, pities, envied, pitted, &c. is shortened into the identical sound î. (15.) Thus the sound â in laudanum, laurel, and cauliflower, is shortened into the identical sound ô. (17.) And in the same manner it has happened that â in ate, in many, and any, has been shortened into ê.

120. Other combinations of vowel letters have short sounds, because one of the letters being quite disregarded, both as to the sound it generally claims, and as to any effect it might have on other letters, the remaining letter receives the sound which under the general rules it is entitled to. This constantly takes place in the unaccented termination ous, which is always pronounced ûs. So also, though the syllable is accented, the i in plaid and railery is quite disregarded. It is the same with the a and o in Dæd'-alus, Æn'-o-barbus, æc'-o-nom'-ics, amaf'-ida, where the syllable is shortened because the accent, principal or secondary, is higher than the penultimate; (92;) to which examples we may add fæt'-id and Mick'-aelmas. Thus again the a is disregarded in head, dead, breath, death, measure, pleasant, weapon, &c., and also in dearth, earl, heard, search, &c. where, though the guttural vibration restores quantity to the vowel combination, it does not give it its regular quality, the sound being er, (35,) and not êar. (43.) Thus, too, the i is disregarded in nonpareil, heifer; the e in foreign, forfeit; the o in leopard, scoff, jeep-ardly; the i in friend, fieldfare; the u in build, built; the a in the last syllable of marriage, carriage; the u in conduit; in cough and trough; in lough and shough; the w in knowledge; and the o in country, couns-in, coup-le, cour-ge, nourish, touch, young, &c. And as, in the last examples, the combination ou is under the accent, we need not be surprised that, in an unaccented syllable, the o is almost uniformly disregarded; as in Sidmouth, Weymouth, &c.—indeed, the preservation of the full sound of unaccented ou, as in pronoun, is by exception rather than by rule. Again, in the plurals of words which are formed by changing y when pronounced êy, into ies, the e is quite disregarded, as in duties from duty, pronounced dû-tîz. It is only when y in the singular has its long sound, as in ally, that the digraph ie in the plural has the regular sound indicated at 106.

121. Other combinations of vowel-letters have short sounds, because one of the letters is used merely as the significant or idle attendant on a consonant, and in that capacity not intended to bear a sound itself. Thus, in vengeance, allegiance, &c., the e or i is a significant attendant on g, implying that it must have its soft sound, and it leaves the a unaffected to take the sound â. In piquant, the u, a constant follower of q, and generally taking the consonant sound w, is an idle attendant on that letter, and the a, as in the former instance, is left unaffected. The u in guess, quest, guilt, guin-ea, is merely significant of the hard sound of g; and the u in biscuit of the hard sound of c. In guard, &c., the u occupies the same place without the same reason, for the g would be hard without it: it is probable, however, that the u was not originally mute: See 145. And in gier-ragle the i is idle, for the g would be soft without it: the absorbing of i when pronounced as y consonant is however to be expected as a natural effect when soft g precedes. As to the concurrence of vowel-letters in the final syllables eal, ial, ean, ian, eon, ion, eous, ious, in line-al, soci-al, Tartare-an, Greci-an, trunche-on, nati-on, herbace-ous, capaci-ous, &c., the e or i must be considered as belonging to a former syllable, at least originally, and its liquidizing into y consonant in some of the instances, and entire absorption into the previous sound in others, is to be spoken of hereafter. See 146, 147, 148.

122. Next to the short vowels, the order of our scheme brings us to the incidental vowels that are essentially long. The first of these, ā, (23,) never occurs without guttural vibration by any general principle of the language; except when letter a is followed by th, or by lf, ln, lv, the l being silent: (see 97, 111, 139:) except also when the digraph au is followed by n and another consonant; as in aunt, haunt, askant, flaunt, jaunt, haunch, paunch, launch, jaundice, laundress, daunt, saunter. In all these words, and also in laugh, draugh, draught, good usage is in favour of this, instead of the broader and usual sound of the digraph au: yet the more partial rule is difficult to maintain, and will perhaps at last merge in the general principle. Vaunt and uvaunt are decidedly within the pale of the latter: haunt and flaunt are with difficulty restrained from it by those who would be thought to speak better than the vulgar; and craunch, draugh, and draught, seem likely not only to desert the broad sound, but also to give up the letter u; when the next declension would be, to narrow the ā into ā. Such is no doubt the process that demand and command have undergone, and hence the reason that speakers of the old school, and the vulgar universally, pronounce the a broad in both these words. The a in can't and sha'n't is also broad in consequence of lengthening the vowel to compensate for the omitted sounds. These are accidental instances of the occurrence of the sound ā. But though, without guttural vibration, it is scarcely to be heard with a general law in its favour, the unaccented sound ō occurs constantly as the regular sound of letter a when not under accent, and not followed in the same syllable by a consonant. See 24 and 98.

123. All the other incidental long vowels, viz. āw or āwe; ō; oi or oy, ou or ow; are denoted by digraphs which are then only regularly pronounced when they take the sounds in question; as the sounds in question are then only regularly denoted when they occur respectively under these digraphs. An exception scarcely needs be made to the last part of the observation, because the sound āw is found under au as well as under aw, the w and u, as vowel-letters, being equivalent. The irregular sounds of these digraphs have in general been noticed in some of the preceding sections. The digraph au, as we have just seen, (122,) has a less regular sound in aunt, haunt, &c. Oo can scarcely be called irregular when it takes the short and in other respects identical sound ō; (118;) but it has a sound decidedly irregular in blood and flood; (118;) in brooch; (108;) and also in door and floor, which are to be noticed hereafter. (132.) We proceed next to

124. The digraph oi, which is irregular in choir, originally written, and still pronounced, quire. In tortoise, both the o and the final e are disregarded, while the same digraph oi, in avoirduois, connoisseur, turquoise, chamois, adroit, and devoir, is pronounced variously, not from any principle of our language, but from awkward attempts at reconciling foreign with native sounds. Leaving the customary pronunciation of such words to the dictionary, we come next to

125. The irregular sounds of ou and ow. The former of these is irregular in a great many words, where, as we have lately seen, (120,) the o is quite disregarded. It is also irregular in words derived immediately from the French; as in group, soup, rouge, route, &c., as well as in some genuine English words; as through, wound, you, youth, &c., to which, as ow is but another form of ou, we may add stowk, &c.: in all of these the sound of the digraph is ō. Another sound of this digraph, namely ō, as in soul, mould, shoulder, poultrie, &c., (108,) in blow, slow, crow, flown, growth, &c., is deemed irregular only as compared with its sound in foul, mound, out, &c., and in now, coul, down, &c. (See 108, and the correspondent note.) In unaccented syllables, the sound ō may be deemed the usual pronunciation of ou or ow; as in fellow, window, &c., borough, furlough, &c., in all of which the u or w is mute, and the o alphabetical. Another irregular sound of ou, viz. āw, occurs in ought, bought, thought, &c. (126.) Another, viz. ō, in would, could, and should; and another, viz. ō, in cough, trough, &c. (120.)

126. The irregular modes of denoting the sounds āw, ō, oy, and ow may next be stated, though it will, for the most part, be but a repetition of what has already been shown. And first with regard to the sound āw, this, as we have seen, is often found under a written simply; that is, without the w; (112;) it is also found under ou followed by ght, the t only being sounded, in ought, bought, brought, fought, thought, nought, sought, wrought; and (an irregularity not yet noticed) it is likewise found under the combination oa in broad and groat, and under oo in extraordinary, a contraction of extra-ordinary.

127. With regard to the sound ō, we have seen that it is often to be found under u, as in rude, ruler, &c. for the reasons assigned at 109; and the same reasons will explain why it is found under ew, ue, and ui in brew, drew, &c., true, rue, &c., bruise, fruit, &c. For these combinations would have had their regular sound ū, if r had not preceded. It is likewise found, as recently stated, (125,) under the combination ou, in words of obvious French origin, and in the native words through, you, youth, wound, (the subat.) and uncouth. To these belong would, could, and should, from which, however, the currency of speech has not only subtracted the t, but the long sound of the vowel, and reduced the words in pronunciation to wōd, cōd, and shōd. In cautchouc, the sound in question is heard long in the first syllable, and short in the other, and the a in the first syllable is dropped. It is found under eo in galleon, under oe in shoe and canoe, and under oeu in manoeuv're.

128. With regard to the sounds oi or oy, (29,) ou or ow, (31,) though the letters, as we have recently seen, are sometimes irregularly pronounced, yet the sounds are never irregularly denoted; that is to say, they never occur but under those characters.

129. The order of the vowel scheme next brings us to inquire, how the vowel letters, whether single or in combination, are sounded in connection with the letter r. The inquiry is partly answered by the scheme itself, to which all that follows to the end of 134 must be considered supplemental or exceptive. In mā'-ry, ā'-id, bē'-ry, pō'-il, spī'-it, lŷ'-ic, tō'-rid, fō'-id, hūr'-ry, &c. the vowel before the rough r has the short sound it would have before any other consonant; and in the frequent terminations ary and ory, as in mercā'-y, nugā'-y, the a and the o have the same obscure short sounds we hear in the unaccented syllables of chapman and common. It is true that in char'-ry, star'-ry, tar'-ry, stir'-rer, pur'-ring, words immediately allied to the verb to char, (to burn wood,) to the nouns star and tar, and the verbs to stir, to pur, we preserve the long guttural sound proper to the latter words; but the practice does not extend beyond these and similar instances; and the verb to tarry, which has no relationship to tar, is pronounced tā'-ry. As to such irregularities as squirrel, panegyric, and sirup, which are sounded as if written squer-rel, paneger-ic, and sur-up, they have been already noticed in a proper place. (115.)

130. The letters ar, er, ir, or, and ur, have no general deviations from their regular sounds which are not noticed in the sections from 33 to 40 inclusive. As exceptive to the rules there given, it remains to be stated that in char, (work done by the day,) and in scarce, the letters ar are sounded är; that in war, quart, and all words in which the sound w precedes, they are pronounced or, according to a principle to be stated hereafter; (140;) that er are irregularly sounded är in clerk and sergeant, and formerly, but not now, in merchant, Derby, and several other words; that ir in words of very common use, as already noticed, (35,) are sounded ur; that or are sounded ör in port, whether as a word or syllable, (except in important, importunate, and their immediate relations,) in borne, frorne, fort, form, (meaning a bench; for form meaning figure is regular,) ford, forge, force, forth, horde, porch, worn, sworn, sword, corps, divorce, bordland; (116;) that the same letters, viz. or, are sounded ör in worsted and Worcester, (see 116;) and that in word, work, world, worm, worae, wort, worth, worship, &c., they are sounded ur, according to a principle to be stated hereafter. (141.) To these we may add, as also sounding or like ur, attorn, attorney, and a word whose pronunciation offends against all principle, namely, colonel. (See the word in the dictionary.)

131. The vowel combinations that, followed by r, take the sounds ar, er, or, and ur, are such, in general, as would have been sounded ä, ë, ö, and ü, in connection with any consonant letter but r. In the words heart, hearten, and hearth, the e is evidently disregarded; the former a is disregarded in the last syllable of bazaar; the a after e in earl, earn, earth, dearth, heard, hearse, pearl, search, &c., in correspondence with the practice noticed at 120. Many speakers pronounce fearful as clashing with these words when used in the sense of terrible, but, in the sense of timorous, it is pronounced regularly by all speakers; so also in tiere and fierce many speakers disregard the i. The o before w is disregarded by general consent in a numerous class of words, as journ'-al, journ'-ney, scourge, &c.; a practice in unison with a still wider principle in clam'our, va'pour, col'our, &c., because in these the syllable is unaccented. (120.) In guard, guardian, the letter u, necessary and significant although silent when used after g and before e or i, is evidently a mere idle letter; (121;) while the e in grandeur, originally sounded in a distinct syllable, has liquidized into y consonant, and is commonly absorbed by the sound imparted to the previous d. (148.) In centaur, where the digraph au takes its regular sound äu, the last syllable identifies with the 38th element, or.

132. Respecting the literal combinations are, ere, ire, ore, wre, oor, oir, our, and ower, it is to be observed that are is irregular when it is the plural of am, art, is, the e being disregarded; ere is irregular in there and where, and also in ere, (adv.,) by being pronounced är; also in were the verb, (and indeed in ere the adverb when unaccented,) by being pronounced er; ire is pronounced ur in sapphire and in saire, not without the sanction of a principle; for the syllable being unaccented, the final e is dropped as it is in many other similar cases, (105,) and the remaining letters ir are then necessarily sounded ur; (36;) ore is sometimes sounded irregularly in where, (107,) and it is always irregular in the colloquial pronunciation of forehead; wre is liable to be sounded oor in all cases where sounds of difficult junction with ür (i. e. yoor) precede; (see 61, 62, 63, 64, 69, 73;) oor is sounded ör in door and floor, and vulgarly, but not politely, in moor also; oir is a combination found in no word purely English except choir, and this was originally written as it is pronounced, viz. quire; in avoirduois the same combination is sounded er, and in devoir, memoir, &c., it is sounded wür; our and ower are sounded irregularly on the occasions that render ou and ow irregular; (see 125;) thus the digraph our is sounded ur in scourge, journal, journey, cowleous, courtesy, and touriquet; it is sounded oor in your, tour, fourbe, amour, and by some speakers in tourney; it is sounded ör (which is scarcely to be deemed an irregular pronunciation) in four, court, gourd, course, source, pour, tourney, &c.; and this is likewise the sound of the combination ow-er in all words where the digraph ow was sounded ö previously to the addition of er, as in sower, one who sows; shower, one who shows; lower, the comparative of low, or to lower, a verb signifying to bring low; while the verbs to shower, signifying to rain, and to lower, signifying to look black, are pronounced regularly.

133. The literal combinations taking the sounds āre, ēre, īre, ōre, ūre, ōre, and ower, have been already pointed out in various sections. Thus, by referring to 100, it will be understood that air, ayr, or ayer, and eyr, have āre for their regular sound, as in fair, Ayr, and gayer; but that ear, eir, and eer, as in bear, heir, and ne'er, (though the cause—i. e. nēver, nē-ūr—is evident in the last instance,) have that sound less regularly. By referring to 102, it will in like manner be understood that eer, ear, and ær, have ēre for their regular sound, as in deer, fear, ærie, but that ier takes the same sound with something less of legal claim in tier, fierce, and grenadier; for, by referring to 106, it will be found that this combination has īre for its regular sound; as in fiery and wiery. Again, by referring to 108, it will be seen that the combination oar has ōre for its regular sound, as in hoar, soar, &c.; that our and ower, as in four, flower, may also be conceived to indicate the sound regularly, by supposing the u and o silent; but that oor in door, and ewer in sewer, one who sews, take the same sound irregularly; to which last example we may add sewer, a drain, if the common pronunciation, shōre, is to be admitted. By referring to 110, it will be understood that the literal combinations uer and ower have ūre for their regular sound, as in suer, one who sues, and fewer. From the vowel scheme it will also be apparent what are the regular sounds of oor and ower, while by referring to 127 we learn why the combinations ewer and our take the sound oor in some few words, as in brewer,¹³³ tour, amour, &c. It has likewise been shown that the literal combination our has ower for its regular sound, and that there are no literal combinations but our and ower that stand for the 53rd and 54th elements.

134. From the view which has just been taken in various places of the vowels terminating in guttural vibration, it will be readily understood that the unaccented final syllables ar, er, ir, &c. (which it will be remembered are all sounded ur) must combine in such a way with a previous vowel sound, that each will in every case form with it one of the elements included between 41 and 54 in the scheme. Hence the reason that pay-er and may-or; li-ar, buy-er, and high-er; slow-er and grow-er; su-er and new-er; tru-er, brew-er, and do-er; bow-er and flow-er; are perfect rhymes to mare, hire, lore, cure, poor, and hour. Further, as ēre and ōre are equivalent to ēur and ōur, (see 43 and 47 in the scheme.) and unaccented ar (34) almost or quite identifies with ur, the following and all similar words may be esteemed quite regular in pronunciation, if the a or u, which we consider silent in dēal, cōal, mōuld, &c. is assigned to the guttural r:—fē'ar, bō'ard, cō'arse, cō'urse, cō'art, bō'urn, fō'ur, &c.

¹³³ Sewer, a drain, by those who wish to avoid the vulgarity of the common pronunciation, and yet not deviate into a sound wholly unlike it, will be classed with these words, and pronounced sōr, though without the reason (namely, the previous r) which justifies this mode of sounding ewer in brewer.

Our progress through the schemes here brings us to the consonant-elements; but it will be advisable to interpose in this place the statement of a few principles that have a general reference, some to grammatical distinctions, and some to the euphony of the language, as well for the purpose of explaining a few of the apparent irregularities in what has preceded, as of smoothing the way to some that are to follow.

135. In the first place it may be mentioned, as a general tendency of the language, that verbs having a long vowel in the present tense shorten it in the preterite and past participle. Thus, bite becomes bit, lead becomes led, &c. Hence, when this is not done by the spelling of the word, it is done by the pronunciation. Thus eat in the present becomes ēat in the past; read, rēad; hear, hēard; gō, gōne; shine, shōne; do, (dō), done, (dūn); &c. The verb trēad is short in the present, but the same tendency has evidently produced trōd in the past. The verb bēat, it is true, is an exception to the rule, (for where shall we find a rule of pronunciation in our language that is not crossed in some particulars by mere caprice?) but it is an exception which is not regarded in all parts of the empire, the sentence he played with me, and I beat him, being a very common one out of the pale of the higher classes in London.

136. Another tendency, not merely of our language, but of language generally, is, to shorten the primitive elements of compound words. By this, the smaller elements are united into larger, and new words continually formed; so that every struggle against this tendency is a struggle to reduce language to a chaos of minute parts. In this direction does the mere etymologist labour when he would have us, by our pronunciation, signify the original parts of words. Contrary, however, to his habits, we contract sheep and herd into shepherd, vine and yard into vineyard; and, guided by the same principle, we pronounce with shortened vowels the words breakfast, forehead, housewife, zealous, knowledge, &c. The same principle often causes farewell to be sounded far-well.

137. Among the modes by which, in our language, we distinguish from each other nouns and verbs that are the same, or almost the same in form, one is to give certain consonant letters a sharp hissing sound in the noun, and a vocalized sound in the verb. Thus the noun advice is distinguished from the verb to advise; use from to use; grease from to grease; house from to house; mouth from to mouth; excuse from to excuse, &c. It ought further to be understood that verbs have generally a tendency to vocalize se in their termination, whether they have correspondent nouns or not. With regard to those that have correspondent nouns, we may observe, that the difference of accent is sometimes added to the difference of sound, as in ref'use and to refuse; prem'ise and to promise. The vulgar, then, are in the right when they say pract'ice and to practise; but here, as on other occasions, the caprice of fashion interferes, and in this one instance obliges us to pronounce noun and verb, though differently spelled, in all respects alike. On the other hand, in the verbs to suffice and sacrifice, the principle has been allowed to communicate a most irregular sound to the letter c. This, if not altered in the verb, certainly ought not to be adopted in the noun sacrifice; yet such is the practice of most speakers, and according to this practice is the word marked in all former pronouncing dictionaries. And as there is a tendency generally in verbs to vocalize the terminal se, so words immediately derived from such verbs have the correspondent s vocalized; as from accuse, (accuze,) accuser, accusative, &c. The same principle is acted upon in nouns and verbs ending in th; as mouth, to mouth; and frequently e mute is added to the verb to signify this difference.¹³⁷

138. The foregoing tendencies of pronunciation have their origin in grammar; the following arise from the nature of the sounds, and the action of the organs in passing from sound to sound. First, we may consider the peculiar nature of the consonant l as the cause of many of the irregularities in the letters pronounced with it. It is almost a vowel; the tip of the tongue applied to the upper gum is all the obstruction interposed to the voice in sounding it; which free utterance of voice, blending with a previous vowel, easily produces a longer and broader sound than would be likely to occur with a different consonant. It is certainly possible to sound a before l precisely as it is sounded before t; but it is not possible to make the syllable ât so long as we can make the syllable âl:—the l, then, has a sound of its own; and the two sounds, viz. of the vowel and of the consonant, (â and ul.) have a natural tendency to blend and form a long syllable, in the same manner that all the vowels blend and form a long and generally a broad syllable with r. This may account for the long sounds of the vowel-letters in all, salt, bald, false, &c., roll, old, coll, &c. And in the same way we might account for the long sound of i before ld, in wild, child, &c., but the effect in this case is attributable rather to the joint power of the two consonants, which is here that of a syllable standing separate from the i; as when from the verb to file we form the participle fil'd. So likewise the i is long in And, blind, &c., the nd being esteemed to stand separate from the i; as when from the verb to sne we form the participle sn'd.

139. Generally, it is a principle that a vowel, losing in pronunciation the consonant that follows it in the spelling, becomes, on that account, long; as the vowels in demône, impêgn, sign, nigh, isle, indict, viscount, impugn. Moreover, the highly vocal character of l is the reason that it often melts altogether into the previous vowel, which is then almost always long; as in calf, salve, calm, balm, almond, &c.; talk, walk, falcon, auln, &c.; folk, yolk, &c.; to solder, &c.

140. If one consonant has a tendency to change the character of the previous vowel, another will be found frequently to alter the vowel that follows it. Such is a common effect of the consonant w. It contracts and then widens the aperture of the mouth, (57,) and the opening thus formed is precisely that which is required by the broadest vowel in our language, namely âw. Hence the word wa-ter is uttered with less effort than wa-ter, the broad sound of the a following the previous outward action of the lips more naturally, that is more readily, than its narrow alphabetical sound. In this way we may account for the pronunciation of a large class of words, water, war, warm, quart, &c., where the vowel is long; wad, wan, was, swan, waddle, watch, quantity, quality, &c., where the vowel, identical in other respects, is short. In wrath, the a ought to be sounded â, (122,) yet we sound it âw; which broader sound has no doubt been produced by the presence of w to the eye, though it is silent to the ear.

141. But if, through the cause assigned, the regular sound of a after w is âw, or ô, how shall we distinguish in pronunciation the letter o, when it comes after w, from the letter a? We must change the sound of the o to make won distinct from wan, and word from ward. This necessity seems to account for the practice which prevails, with some classic exceptions (aliquot, for instance,) of sounding o after w as short u: and the rule, be it observed, includes one, once, &c., which are pronounced as if spelled with u. Yet the adverb only, originally written one-ly, does not follow the present pronunciation of its primitive, and hence it should seem that the present was not the original pronunciation either of one or of its compounds.

142. But though, from the causes assigned in 138 and 140, the consonant l has a tendency to give letter a a broad sound by coming after it, and w a tendency to give it the same broad sound by coming before it, yet these tendencies often yield to the more general rules of the language, as in mallet, where the l is single in the first syllable, because the other l belongs to the next; and sometimes there are organic causes which partially counteract them. If l is to be followed by a labial or labio-dental consonant, the broad sound of the vowel will frequently be prevented, the transition to such a consonant from a narrow vowel (as in Alps, Albion, Alfred) being easier than from a broad vowel. By something of a similar cause the broad sound of a is prevented in war, wag, twang, waft, &c. In other cases we must ascribe the more regular sound of a to the prevalence of classical over vernacular habits. In aliquant, for instance, the regular sound of the a in the last syllable is more prevalent among good speakers than the idiomatic.

143. But the irregularities of the vowels

¹³⁷ In a doubt respecting the orthography of certain words, the principle here exhibited may determine the writer; thus, if he doubts whether to spell chace or chase, licence or license, let him adopt the former mode for the noun, the latter for the verb: the pronunciation under each mode of spelling is the same. Expense, which has no correspondent verb, is spelled by the best writers with an s, from the low Latin expensa.

produced by organic causes are very few, compared with those of the consonants arising out of that source. The ready transition from one action of the organs to another must be, and always has been, regarded in every language; nor would ours with respect to its consonants be more irregular than the ancient Greek, if, like the Greek, it were permitted to signify by a change of letter every change of sound prescribed by the necessities of fluent pronunciation. In Greek, the slender with the middle and the aspirated consonant was constantly interchangeable, not only in pronunciation, but equally and correspondently in the spelling. The latter liberty is not given to our language, bound as it is to furnish to the eye of the etymologist a constant clue to the origin of every word. But the other liberty it cannot be defrauded of; and hence arises the discrepancy, in great part, of our spelling and pronunciation. It is evident that p and b cannot be made distinct in cupboard without much effort; that s must be vocalized, that is, converted into z, when it follows in the same syllable certain consonants requiring voice; as in tubs, lads, hags, gloves, &c.; as, on the other hand, z must be aspirated when it follows a consonant articulated only with breath, as in chintz. It is equally plain that d must lose its voice, that is, be converted into t, when, by sinking e in the termination ed, it follows a consonant without voice; as in trac'd, chap'd, pick'd, shap'd, dress'd, tax'd, &c. The discrepancy of the spelling and pronunciation in all such cases should surely be considered the fault of the former, if a fault, in not conforming to the latter, than of the latter in not conforming to the former. Why should the pronunciation of a language be obstinately uncouth, because its spelling is obstinately tied to foreign or obsolete etymologies? It is possible, with a great deal of pains, to pronounce suggest and exaggerate so as to preserve to each g its regular sound; but surely the elegant, because the easy pronunciation of these words, is that which runs both letters into the same sound, namely, that of j. So it is possible to preserve the sound of the first p in sapphire, the first t in Matthew, the first s in mission; yet no speaker does so. Further, it is possible to sound ph as f before th in diphthong, triphthong, apophthegm, &c.; but a cause, similar to that which in Greek brought the two aspirated consonants together, forbids that, as English words, they should have the ph so sounded. In the original pronunciation of Greek there can be no doubt that β , τ , and ϕ were consonants of the same organic formation, as were also δ , γ , and θ : with us, likewise, b and p are related to each other in the same way, and also d and t: but, as we now pronounce Greek, the relationship of ϕ to β and τ , and of θ to δ and γ , is quite lost; the sound f is organically essentially different from b and p; and the sound th organically, essentially different from d and t. Therefore, though διφθόγγος was the only way in which the word could be easily, gracefully, pronounced by an ancient Greek, it does not follow that dif-thōng is not a harsher and more uncouth pronunciation than dip-thōng; or that we are justified in twisting our organs to say ap'-ōf-thēm, (apophthegm), when ap'-ō-thēm is the easier and current pronunciation. To the general principle here investigated all words may therefore be referred which are apparently irregular in sound from the change of kindred consonants into each other, or the dropping of such consonant sounds as, if retained, would obstruct the fluent action of the organs. The dropping of the t in Christmas is explicable on this general principle; and indeed the more particular investigations or statements with respect to the consonants, which remain in order to complete the rules supplemental to the schemes, are almost all resolvable into the principle thus generally treated in the present section.

144. Surely it is due to our native language, when we adopt foreign words, to dissolve all such combinations of sound as are quite abhorrent to its genius, or to the course of improvement observable even in words of native growth. If we are justified in having dropped the initial sound of wrong, wrest, wrack, &c., gnaw, gnarl, gnat, &c., know, knee, knave, &c., it would be inexcusable not to comply with the custom which drops the first consonant sound in Czar, Cleislas, bdellium, pneumatics, Psyche, &c. It is not so easy to say why phthisis and its compounds should, after sinking the first consonant sound, namely f, refuse the modern pronunciation of the Greek θ ; nor is it a justification to say that t is probably much nearer to the ancient θ than h, unless in all other words we so pronounced the Greek consonant. The irregularity is, however, established, nor would much be gained by opposing it.

145. In this place, previously to noticing other changes in the sounds of consonant-letters which arise in the transition from sound to sound, it will be proper to point out certain changes from vowel into consonant sounds which have their origin from the same cause. We have seen (57 and 58) that w and y are consonants which have the vowels oo and ē for their bases; and the latter being convertible respectively into the former by a superadded action of the organs, we may expect such conversion to take place, whenever the added action would assist the transition from the previous to the following sound. Let it be supposed that the u in suavie, cuirass, languid, quibble, was originally sounded ū or ū: it is easy to conceive, first, the dropping of a part of that sound, so that the words should be suo-ā'-siv, coo-ē'-ras, &c., and then that the oo should become w, by the addition of that action which the passage from the consonant previous to the vowel after it naturally produces. It is further worth notice, that any remaining difficulty in pronouncing the sounds thus brought together leads to another step, namely, that of rejecting the w altogether. On board of ship, where the word buoy is always occurring, it is called a boy, though the slow correct pronunciation is bwoy. In the same way the sound of w is always sunk in the names Greenwich and Dulwich, as it likewise is in sword and two. There is every reason to think the w was originally sounded in bug, guard, &c., where at present it is a mere idle letter; and also in guess, guide, &c., where, though not idle, it is silent. In unguent, language, &c., it is still sounded, and by many speakers in conquer, though the more usual pronunciation drops the w, which is likewise the practice in coquet, harlequin, masquerade, piquant, quadrille, and a number of other words chiefly of French origin. In adunque, the u are mere idle attendants on g: (compare 121.)

146. The conversion of the vowel sound é into the consonant sound y takes place in the same manner, that is to say, whenever the sound before, and the sound after, naturally produce it; and the partial or total absorption of the sound often follows this effect. In vi-re-ous, curi-ous, &c., the sound é in the second syllable is preserved from the nature of r, which refuses to take y after it in fluent union. In per-me-ate, athe-ist, line-al, geni-al, radi-ant, trivi-al, copi-ous, it is likewise preserved, but not so completely that English organs, in pronouncing these words, are not sensible of a tendency to shorten the last two syllables into yate, yist, yal, yant, &c.; and when the more liquid l precedes, as in malleable, blual, million, blitious, &c., the conversion of the sound é into y consonant is complete. In Hallehjah, the j unusually stands for i, and in that capacity, namely, as equivalent to r, is pronounced y. So likewise the e in bludg-eon, dung-eon, &c., is in a situation to take the sound of y consonant, which sound, however, in these and similar instances, is not heard, the preceding consonant sound being of such a nature as to absorb the sound of y; just as, in the common termination tion, the sound sh which the t assumes has swallowed up the following i, the syllable being completed by on sounded as in the last syllable of common. The sounds which precede, and which absorb or tend to absorb the consonant element 53, this element, on the other hand, producing or tending to produce changes in some of those preceding consonants, are points, which, as they ought to be well understood, will justify the investigation contained in the following section.

147. Let any English mouth fluently pronounce the phrase "I'll meet you;" without accent or emphasis on you, and there will be heard, in the transition from the t in meet, to the y in you, a slight interposed sound of sh, or the element 61. So likewise in saying, "Would you favour me?" there will be heard, in the transition from the d in would, to the y in you, an interposed sound of the vocal sh, that is, of the element 62. The cause is, that the speaker having to touch the upper gum with the tongue in sounding t or d, and then to utter the y lightly, is more negligent in the transition than he would be if the word you were accented or emphatic; and the sound sh or zh in consequence slides in. It would indeed be possible, as with the accented, so with the unaccented word you, to prevent the intrusion; but what the speaker would gain in accuracy by such care, he would lose in ease and fluency of transition. So likewise it is possible to preserve the pure sound of the t and d in nature and verdure; yet nothing is more certain than that they are not preserved pure by the best and most careful speakers; and the t or d being converted, or almost converted into tsh or dzh, (63, 64,) the y which enters into the composition of ü, (=you=you) is absorbed by (or perhaps it should be said, enters into the composition of) the new formed element. Moreover t and d are not the only dentals:—s and x are likewise formed by touching the upper gum; and the letter c, followed by e or i, is equivalent to s; and x is equivalent to ks. Neither is the consonant element 58 found only under its proper character y, or heard only in the alphabetic sound of letter w, or in the pronoun you, but it is likewise very frequently found under e and i, in such common terminations as can, eous, eal, &c., iule, ion, ious, &c. Now, supposing the words nauseate, roseate, righteous, hideous, nation, glazier, ocean, social, soldier, grandeur, notorious, luxury, were originally pronounced nāwsh'-yāt, rōz'-yāt, rit'-yūs, hid'-yūs, nāt'-yūn, glāz'-yer, ōc'-yān, sōc'-yāl, sōld'-yer, grān'-yur, nōcks'-yus, lūcks'-you-rēy.—we can easily conceive how, in English mouths, they come to be pronounced, or have a tendency to be pronounced, nāwsh'-yāt, rōwzh'-yāt, rit'-sh'ūs, (=ri'-ch'ūs), hid'-zh'ūs, (=hid'-j'ūs), nā'-hūn, glā'-zh'er, ō'-sh'ān, sō'-sh'āl, sōle'-jer, grān'-jur, nōck'-shūs, lūck'-shoo-rēy. Admitting the tendency, then, to these corruptions, the question occurs, is a speaker justified in yielding to this tendency? In many words, it cannot be doubted that he must yield to it, if he wishes to escape the ridiculous effect of pronouncing as nobody else pronounces; in other instances, he may decidedly adopt the more regular sounds; but in the majority of cases his best course will be neither to yield decidedly to the practice, nor very carefully to avoid it, this being one of the cases in which the extreme either way has a bad effect. The pronunciation contemplated by this general direction cannot always be marked in the dictionary with precision; and where this cannot be done, the regular pronunciation of the word, if it will bear a regular pronunciation, is always given in preference: but to all the instances admitting a discretionary application of the rule, as well as to those in which the irregular pronunciation is decidedly adopted, the reference to these remarks is appended, and the inspector will hence be enabled to apply the rule as circumstances may require.—As to the word sure, in which the interposed sh usurps the proper sound of s, see 119.

148. With regard to such words as come under the predicament considered in the previous section, it is another nice point to know when the absorption of the consonant element 58 should be total, when partial, and when not at all. In the dictionary, the partial absorption is signified by the mark ('), the note of the 55th element; if the sound of y is to be completely heard, the proper letter indicates the sound; if to be completely absorbed, the word is spelled accordingly.

149. The words sure and sugar, pronounced shōōr and shōōg'-ar, were not brought forward among the examples in 147, because, admitting to a certain extent the legitimate operation of the principle there investigated, it affords no excuse for the corruption of s before ū in an accented syllable; and these two words with their compounds, and also sewer, a drain, if it must be pronounced shōōr, (see, however, note ¹²⁸.) are therefore to be set down as decided irregularities, and will come under a general notice with others of a like kind hereafter. (167.) At present, we are considering such irregularities as may in part be justified by the ease or melody gained. Abscision and transition are commonly pronounced contrarily to rule, the element sh, which gives the short sound to the i in the second syllable, being vocalized. This occurs through the unconscious predetermination of the ear, that since the syllable began with the hissing non-vocal consonant s, it ought, for the sake of variety, to finish with a consonant of a different kind. In other words which exemplify a similar irregularity there is less excuse: for instance, in Greenwich and Dulwich, which vocalize the ch. In ostrich the ck used to be vocalized, but the practice now wavers. Spinach is another example; but this word is often written as it is pronounced, spin'age.

150. The ear instinctively avoids, if possible, a quick repetition of similar sounds. Hence some other apparent inconsistencies in the practice of the best speakers. The word pronunciation is regularly pronounced prō-nūn'-shē-ā'-shūn, and by all speakers would probably be so sounded, if it were related to any such verb as to pronounce, in the same way that association and enunciation are related to associate and enunciate. In the absence of any such related verb, most speakers say prō-nūn'-cē-ā'-shūn, and so avoid the double occurrence of the sound sh in the same word.

151. The letter which most frequently changes its naturally aspirate for a vocal sound is s. Some of the occasions for this change have been already noticed: see 137, 143. The reason that s often becomes vocal in the prefix dis is noted in the dictionary, at the particle Dis. At present, it is to be stated that s is always vocalized, that is, pronounced as z, when, in forming the plural of a noun or the third person of a verb, it can be so pronounced. It cannot be so pronounced in tuffs, chafes, shakes, hopes, hats, lights, &c., because the preceding consonant element is non-vocal; but in faces, cases, churches, kisses, boxes, &c., a vowel sound intervenes between the final s and the previous non-vocal consonant, and s, in consequence, is vocalized. Hence it is also always vocal in the classical plurals ma'-nes, anti'-o'-des, &c. So likewise when s is not a sign of number, case, or person, it is often attracted to its vocal sound by the neighbourhood of vocal elements, whether vowel or consonant; as may be perceived by comparing nasal, proposal, pismire, chasm, baptism, rain, dismal, disorder, dismay, observe, absolve, palsy, easy, casement, in which it is vocal, with pistol, baptist, clasp, float, disturb, opimathy, apsis, tipsy, in which it is non-vocal. But the effect, though real in these and similar instances, must not be depended on; neither must a rule which obtains in some other languages, namely, that s is vocal between two vowels, be counted on with much certainty in ours: for though it is vocal in please, phrase, cause, chrese, wise, those, lose, music, causation, acquisition, &c., it is very often non-vocal in situations perfectly similar, as will be seen in the next section: while, on the other hand, even the doubling of s, or the equivalent digraph ss before e or i, do not always prevent the change into the vocal s, as is proved by the words dissolve, possess, desert, discern, &c. Still less must we expect to find s, when single at the end of words, always, though it is generally, non-vocal when used otherwise than for denoting the plural number of a noun or the third person of a verb: for it is vocal in has, is, as, was, his, all of them words in the most common use. Moreover, even in the middle of some words, s often changes its aspirate for its vocal sound in passing to the plural number, as in houses, pronounced hōw'-zēz, in the singular number of which, house, the s is aspirate.

152. In spite of the tendency of s to become vocal in the situations indicated in the previous section, it preserves its aspirate sound in base, obese, geese, precise, goose, loose, dose, (the subs.) house, mouse, obscene,—nay, even in many verbs, as to cease, to case, notwithstanding the strong general tendency to the opposite practices: (137.) It is always non-vocal in adjectives terminating in -sive and in -ose, as in suasive, jocose; always in the prefix mis-, and more frequently than otherwise in dis-. It is non-vocal, for the most part, at the end of words when not forming the plural number; as in yes, this, us, thus, &c. It is non-vocal in mason, garrison, basin, absurd, absorb, misrelays, heresy, &c., notwithstanding the neighbourhood of vocal elements which so often draw it into its other sound: nay, even in absolution, though vocal in absolute.

153. Even the organic necessity which vocalizes s after some of the vocal consonants (143) is not imperative as to all consonants of that kind. The s, for instance, which is vocal after l, n, and r, in ells, tens, and currs, is not of necessity vocal as it is after b, d, g, and v, in sobs, maids, drags, loves, &c. Accordingly, we find that else, tense, curse, differ from ells, tens, currs, by having the s non-vocal, though to the ear they differ in no other respect. Here, then, we find the mute e used for another significant purpose, namely, to keep s after the liquid consonants from taking its vocal sound. The Latin verb para, a part, in which we make the s vocal, and the English verb to parse, which is derived from it, exemplify the same difference; nor is it advisable to confound this difference by pronouncing the latter like the former.

154. The letter s is nothing but ks, (or cs, which to the ear is the same,) under that single character. Hence, it is liable to the same changes of sound that ks might be liable to, if used instead of it. Thus, for instance, in exert, exist, example, anxiety, luxurious, auxiliary, &c., the vowel in the neighbouring accented syllable draws the s into its vocal sound, (151,) and because the s is vocalized, the k is of necessity vocalized too. (143.) The same takes place in exhibit, cashal, in spite of the aspiration added to the adjoining vowel. But the s is not thus attracted when the next following syllable is unaccented, (exemplary is an exception, from its relationship to exemplar;) nor even when the next vowel is accented, if the k and s included in s should seem, by the meaning or form of the word, to belong, both, to the previous syllable; as in taxa-tion, ven-ditious, dox-ology. In executor, there is a tendency to vocalize the included s, because the accent is on the following syllable; but the relationship to the verb execute counteracts this tendency. In anxious and luxury, the vowel coming after the elements ks is unaccented, and therefore neither consonant is vocalized; but the s becomes liable to another transition, namely, into sh, falling as it does under the predicament investigated, 147:— (see the pronunciation of luxury among the examples in 147:) the pronunciation of anxious is āngk'-sh'ūs, in which we remark another conversion, namely, of n into ng; for which see 153. In Xenophon, and all words commencing with x, the x loses one of its component parts, and the word is pronounced as if written with a z; a practice justified by the principle laid down at 144.

155. Among the irregularities of the consonants, it may seem that we ought to reckon every occurrence of a single sound where there are two or more letters, or of two or more sounds where there is but one letter. This, however, is only analogous to what is constantly occurring among the vowels, where ai, er, oa, aw, oo, &c., denote single sounds in pair, fee, boat, law, moon, &c., and i denotes a double sound or diphthong in bi-ble, bite, &c.: yet we consider the pronunciation of all those words to agree with the spelling, and consequently none of the letters to be sounded irregularly. So we consider bb, ff, ss, cc, sh, th, ph, ng, to be sounded regularly in abb, off, mass, scene, shall, thin, phrase, ring, &c., although under each combination there is but one sound; and x to be sounded regularly in mix, j in jig, &c., although under each letter there are two sounds. The effect, whether we consider it regular or irregular, which combination produces among the consonant-letters, will be best understood from the table at the foot of the page, which exhibits all the combinations of two in the same syllable that occur in the language.¹⁵⁵ One general remark may suffice for the double letters, bb, dd, ff, gg, occurring in the same syllable among the words in the several classes of the table,—namely, that the regular sound is that of the single letter, or, in other words, the doubling of the letter in our language adds nothing to its sound. As to the remaining combinations, those will stand in need of no remark or animadversion which retain sounds exactly corresponding in number and nature to the letters individually: it is only when, in consequence of combination, a sound is dropped or acquired, (as shown, in the table, by the italic letters,) that a remark or a general principle will be needed; and the following sections contain the remarks or principles hence arising.

156. When two consonant letters come together that are articulated by contact in the same part of the mouth, as m and b; m and p; l and n; or that are sounded in the same region, as m and n; or that are followed by a sound that more readily joins itself to the former of the two consonants than the latter, as l when it follows sc or st; m or n when it follows ft or st; g when it follows rt; and o when it follows sw or tw:—in such cases, the latter of the two consonants is generally dropped in pronunciation. Examples: lamb, (see the table ¹⁵⁵, class I.: succumb, and other derivatives from cumbo, are exceptions;) muscle, (class II. and VIII.); bustle, (class VIII. and XIV.); kilt, hymn, (class X.); ademption, (class XI.); often, in which last (see 114) c is silent, mortgage, Christmas, chestnut, gluten, in which last (see 114) e is silent, (class XIV.); sword, two, (class XVI.) This practice is justified by the general principle laid down at 143.

157. Similar causes, or such causes as are referred to at 144, or, in many instances, the liquidizing nature of l, which often melts entirely into certain neighbouring sounds, (139,) will often produce the dropping of the former of two consonants in pronunciation. Examples: bellium, would, (see the table ¹⁵⁵, class III.); calf, (class IV.); phthisis, (class VI.); talk, folk, (class VII.); isle, aisle, (class VIII.); phlegm, drachm, calm, (class IX.); Cneus, gnome, sign, bagno, kneel, auln, mnemonics, pneumatics, demeanee, (class X.); wrong, (class XII.); psalm, (class XIII.); debt, indict, Ctesilas, Ptolemy, receipt, (class XIV.); calve, (class XV.); czar, (class XVIII.) Among these examples, it can scarcely be said that s in isle, in aisle, and demeanee is dropped through an organic indisposition to unite with the l or the n; and it is probable that these words would never have been found among the instances, but for etymological causes. The same may be observed of the c before t in indict.

158. In scanning the remaining examples distinguished from the rest by containing italic letters in the table ¹⁵⁵, we shall find one or the other of these effects:—a change produced in the sound of one or both consonants in consequence of the combination:—the formation of a digraph, the letters of which are not meant to have separate sounds, but the two to answer the purpose of a single character for a single element. Leaving other examples for subsequent sections, it will be sufficient in this to draw attention to the following:—aduncous, (class II.); ring, (class V.); bank, (class VII.); prism, (class IX.); rube, buda, dogs, rings, wreaths, ells, hams, tens, curs, (class XIII.); phalanx, (class XVII.) With respect to all these examples, except ring, bank, aduncous, and phalanx, the change produced in the sound of one of the consonants, namely, of the s, by the proximity of the other consonant, has been accounted for: prism is sounded prizm by the rule 151, which rule, as well as 143, accounts for the same change in rubs, &c., in wreaths, (of which the th is vocal,) in ells, tens, curs, &c.; while 153 lays down that rule of orthography which restores s to its regular power in else, tense, and curve. It remains then to speak of the effect produced on the n by the g, k, c, and x, in the other words, or simply by the g and k: for c hard is but another form of k, and x is the same as ks: moreover, k and g are kindred elements, differing from each other the one by employing only the breath, the other by vocalizing the breath: as to manner of articulation, they are formed at the same place, namely, by a contact of the back part of the tongue and the soft palate. Now, when the speaker has to utter n before he thus applies his tongue,—commencing with the nasal tone which n requires, he neglects, in the rapidity of speech, to complete the n by touching the upper gum, and instead of this, proceeds (still using the nasal tone) to the other place of contact: and as this nasal tone is not that which g requires, the result is neither n nor g, but an element distinct from both, viz., the 72nd in our schemes. Such is the effect which the word ring exemplifies: it is only in the north-western counties that this is not all the effect; for there the g is articulated and added to the element described, (ring-g, long-g, &c.) but this is not the general usage. However, when the g sounded hard is understood to belong to the next, and that an unaccented syllable, it is articulated as a part of this syllable, its effect on the n being the same as if it also belonged to the previous syllable; as in an-ger, fin-ger, &c., to which words, usage obliges us to add youn'-ger, stron'-ger, lon'-ger, though these ought to have assimilated with wrong'-er, sing'-er, &c., and to have been youn'-ger, strong'-er, long'-er. (See 72 and 77.) The effect thus produced by hard g on the n in the previous syllable takes place less frequently when the syllable following the n is accented; for though the effect is liable to occur in Ben-gal, con-grat'ulate, and such like cases, it should in these, in general, be avoided as a negligence. These remarks have all had reference to the effect of g upon n: but the effect of k will be the same; and accordingly bank, aduncous, and phalanx, are sounded bangk, adungcous, and phalangks, where we may remark that k never resigns its articulation as g does in consequence of the change produced in the n; since this would be to identify the sound of nk with that of ng.

159. There are certain irregularities of sound exemplified in class XII. in the table ¹⁵⁵, which may next deserve attention. The combinations bre, cre, gre, and tre, when final in a word, are pronounced bur, cur, gur, and tur. That English organs should thus convert the rough or trilled into the smooth or guttural r, when the vowel sound is dropped with which the rough r was perhaps once articulated, is natural enough;—and the dropping of the sound e in all such instances is obviously an imitation of the French idiom. The metathesis, as grammarians call it, of the r in iron, and colloquially in apron, children, hundred, &c., is of the same nature, and is justified by the ease and smoothness gained.

160. Of the several classes of consonant combinations exhibited in the table ¹⁵⁵, scarcely one now remains requiring notice but those formed with letter k; the most perplexing combinations in the language. This might be expected from the mere fact of letter k being so combined. For it is not the genius of our language, on this side of the Irish channel, to aspirate a vocal, or super-aspirate a non-vocal consonant element, except y or w; and therefore, when the sign of aspiration is joined with any consonant letter, it will with us either be quite silent, as in John, (class X.) or buhl, (class VIII.) or buddha, (class VI.) or it will indicate some unusual sound which this letter, in connection with the h, is to assume. The aspiration of the consonant element y takes place when h precedes the long sound of u; as in human, humidly, &c., (humour and its compounds being exceptions;) and the aspiration of w takes place when h follows letter w at the beginning of a syllable; as in whale, wheat, whame, &c., which are pronounced hwāle, hwēat, hwint, &c.: unless the vowel-letter o succeeds; for then the w is sunk and the h alone is sounded, as in whole, who, &c. (Compare 56.)

161. The remaining consonant-combinations with h are partly of Saxon, partly of Greek, and partly of French origin. C with h will be found in words of all three sources, and is subject in consequence (beside being occasionally silent) to three modes of pronunciation. In words of genuine growth, it indicates the 63d consonant element, which must therefore be considered the regular sound of this combination; as in child, much, which, witch, &c. The t prefixed adds nothing to the sound, but is often useful in preventing any other sound from being given. In words of French origin, the digraph ch is sounded like sh; as in chaise, cartouch; and, in words of Greek and Italian origin, it is sounded k; as in chasm, scheme, ache, chord, epoch, balдахin. Here, however, in the sounds of sch before e and i, we have to encounter some striking inconsistencies. Nothing can be more evident than that, if the Greek χ is to be supplied in our orthography by ch, and if this, in default of the extra-aspiration which our language allows not to a consonant, necessarily identifies with k, the word schism, and schedule, should have sch pronounced as they are in scheme: yet an unnecessary reference of schedule to its French denizenship, with some vague notion perhaps of the alliance of our English sh to the Teutonic sch, has drawn the word into the very irregular pronunciation shēd'-dl; while the other word, schism, from a notion, probably, that, as h is silent, the c should be soft before i, has taken the equally irregular sound sizm; an irregularity the more extraordinary, since in the word septic, (Class II. 155) the c is kept hard for the purpose of showing off a familiarity with the word in Greek, although no letter intervenes between the c and the e, and consistency requires that the c in scene, equally related to the Greek κ, and the c in septic, should be sounded alike. As, however, on other occasions, so in this, we must give way to usage, or incur the effect of opposing it. Drachm is another word that drops ch, as already remarked at 157.

162. The words in which g and h come together in the same syllable (Class VI. 155) are almost all of native growth; and hence we might expect a uniform or regular mode of sounding them; yet this is far from being the case. That seems the most consistent pronunciation which we hear in ghost and burgh, the h, superfluous as a mark of aspiration, being regarded as wholly idle, and the g accordingly receiving its proper sound. On other occasions we seem to think that h ought, in some way, to be aspirated,—for instance, in the Scotch word lough; but, incapable of the Celtic aspiration which is frequently heard north of the Tweed, we merely render the g non-vocal, and thus, in sound, reduce the word to löck; which procedure we likewise follow in hough and shough. Yet we do not seem satisfied with this mode of pronunciation; for we carry it no further than the words quoted; and of these we often change the spelling to accommodate the sound. Thus unsuccessful, we try another mode in laugh and draught, in draugh, rough, tough, slough, enough, clough, trough, and cough, in which we pronounce gh as we do another combination with h, namely ph, and give the two letters the sound of f. But, as if unsatisfied with all these modes of pronouncing gh, we seem in other words to give up both letters in despair, and in bought, &c., in weigh, &c., high, &c., bough, &c., dough, &c., through, &c., waquebaugh, pugh! taught, &c., straight, &c., eight, &c., fright, &c., sight, &c., allow the combination no other effect than that of lengthening the previous vowel where it might otherwise be short. See 115, 139.

163. Words in which p and h come together in the same syllable (Class VI. 155) are almost all of Greek origin. In the English pronunciation of diphthong, triphthong, aphthong, and ophthalmic, dropping the h, which in our language is superfluous as a mark of aspiration with a consonant, we pronounce the remaining consonant, p, in the usual manner. (Compare 143.) But this is not the procedure commonly pursued:—p with h in almost all cases is pronounced f: in Stephen this sound is vocalized, that is, converted into v; and likewise in nephew: almost the only word in which the combination occurs that is not immediately referable to a Greek origin; and even on the spelling of this word an Hellenic influence is suspected. As to the letters phth meeting in the same syllable, who can wonder that an English eye, affrighted by such an assemblage, should close its lid on the first two letters, and consider only how the second two are to be pronounced? See the example, phthisis, at 157.

164. R with h at the beginning of a word or syllable (Class VI. 155) is pronounced uniformly and consistently: for the h, superfluous in our language as the sign of aspiration with a consonant, is merely an indication that the word is of Greek origin, and the remaining r receives its usual sound. The h is also mute in calarrh.

165. The words in which s and h come together in the same syllable are of native growth, (Class VI. 155,) and the h so joined to the s, is, in all cases, an indication not that the s is to have its common dental sound, but the palatal sound, which is the 61st element of the schemes. It is in perfect consistency with this mode of indicating the 61st element, that, throughout the dictionary, the 62d element, which is nothing but the 61st vocalized, is indicated by sh. Let it be remembered, however, that in no one instance does the actual orthography of our language recognise this mode of indicating the element in question, namely, the 62d, and that it is adopted in spelling words as they are pronounced, solely because no other can be found analogous to the actual practice of spelling, and, at the same time, consistent and intelligible.

166. Of the words in which t and h come together in the same syllable, (Class VI.¹⁶⁵), some are of native, and some are of Greek origin. That the Saxon letters þ and ð, for each of which, in default of a single character, we put the two letters th, were articulated by the tip of the tongue between the teeth, seems as probable a fact as any in philology: but that the Greek letter θ, for which we also substitute the same two letters, was articulated in the same way, is not by any means so certain. However this may be, the combination in question, both in words from the Greek and words from the Saxon, is articulated in the way described, forming the 67th or 68th element of the consonant scheme. There is reason to think that the former of the two Saxon letters was the mark for the non-vocal, and the latter for the vocal sound. At present it may be laid down as a general rule, that the non-vocal sound occurs most frequently in words of Greek, and the vocal in words of Saxon origin. To signify this difference in the dictionary th will stand for the former, and th for the latter. Th is always vocalized by final e mute, as in bathe, breathe, blithe. It is also vocal in verbs: see 137. Further, it may be noticed, that in a few words, Thomas, Thames, thyme, asthma, Anthony, &c., the h, superfluous as a mark of consonant aspiration, is disregarded, and the remaining t is articulated as if it stood alone. In eightth, which is formed from eight by adding the sound th, the t belonging to the h is omitted in the spelling, in consequence of which the t, previously belonging to the word eight, does double duty. In five words, namely bath, lath, mouth, oath, and path, the sound, aspirate in the singular, is vocalized in the plural, and the plural s (see 143) is of course vocalized also.

167. The foregoing principles, from 97 inclusive, are an attempt to systematize all words that do not conform to the orthography and pronunciation exhibited in the schemes, and the principles numbered in correspondence with them. Some words, however, still remain which no system can embrace, and which can therefore be referred to no general principle when they occur in the dictionary, unless it be admitted that words falling under this predicament must be met with in every living language, and so the predicament is accepted in place of a principle. And, truth to say, even of the words which have been noticed in the previous sections, a great many individual instances belong to the present rather than to any other division in the general arrangement,—such words, for instance, as gaol, bury, business, feud, to sew, to char, brooch, door, blood, sewer, (a drain), aisle, vale, demesne, viscount, indict, sacrifice, colonel, verath, &c. Of the same description, many words yet remain whose irregularity it would not be more difficult to account for, than for those that have chanced to come under notice. It would be easy to show, for instance, how luteatring shortened in sound first into lu-string, and thence into lustring; wednesday, first into wen-es-day, and thence into wena-day. The irregularity in sounding lieutenant may be accounted for by the practice, common when the word was first introduced from the French, of confounding the letters v and w: the word was written lieutenant and sounded levtenant, which naturally shortened into levtenant.¹⁶⁷ Other instances that class with these will be indicated in the dictionary by a reference to the present section, but without any further notice. Fortunately, the number of these anomalies is daily decreasing, so that many words which, in Walker's dictionary, are marked as having a customary irregular pronunciation, appear in this with regular sounds, and yet with usage in their favour. No well-taught person, except of the old school, now says cuc-cumber or sparrow-grass, although any other pronunciation of cucumber and asparagus would have been pedantic some thirty years ago. And this may lead to a few remarks on the changes that have taken, and may take place, in the pronunciation of our language.

168. First, it must be conceded that they who commence these changes, however useful and necessary in their calling, are for the most part the smaller literati of the country,—they who attend more to manner than to matter, and love to lead the fashion in words, as others love to lead it in dress. To dispute the old and to settle a new pronunciation of a word is a task exactly suited to some abilities, which are not capable of a much higher flight; and, while persons so endowed are to be found ready to undertake the employment, (and they always will be found,) the rest of the world will be content to follow their track, satisfied if clearly understood, and that their manner neither prejudices their matter by uncouthness, nor calls off attention from it by obtrusive nicety or unusual preciseness.¹⁶⁸ But, while it becomes every sensible speaker to adopt all changes for the better, as soon as he safely may, it equally becomes him to oppose such as have no recommendation but caprice and fashion, and which would injure instead of improve the audible structure of our language. What,

¹⁶⁸ As for my own labour in this department of the work, I am aware, despite of the old quotation, Ne quis tanquam parva, &c., that I am working in a field where no honour can be won. But it is my calling, and I conscientiously do my best in it to improve on the labours of my predecessors.

for instance, would the language gain by narrowing the a in quantity and quality, or lengthening the vowel-sound in the first syllable of knowledge? Certainly, nothing on the score of regularity, unless the speaker were disposed to go much further, and narrow the a in wasn, wallet, &c., (140,) and lengthen the vowel in breakfast, zealous, &c. (136:) nor would any thing be gained on the score of sound; such as in many cases might induce a sensible speaker to comply with a new mode of pronunciation, though at the risk of seeming peculiar. In short, after all that precedes, the one principle by which a speaker of good judgement is guided, a principle including all the others, is, usage: it is only when he knows not this usage that he hesitates: and in such cases it is hoped that, till years make it obsolete, the dictionary will be a faithful guide. Meanwhile, if, in opposition to the authority of the dictionary, a word should seem inclined to change its pronunciation, the previous principles will show whether the change would be for the better or the worse, and consequently whether it ought to be adopted or opposed.

169. The elements of syllables in English words should be all that, in an English dictionary, require consideration; but, unfortunately, it is the custom of English people to mingle a multitude of foreign words with those of their own language, which words by degrees fix themselves as a sort of patchwork on the homespun material, and, requiring to be uttered with more or less of their original pronunciation, are precisely the words for which a pronouncing dictionary is likely to be consulted by the mere English scholar. With regard to Greek and Latin words, some hints have already been furnished,—as to accent, by the remarks offered at 86;—as to the sound of final e and es, by those at 101:—and as to the digraphs æ and æ, by those at 103. The seat of accent in Latin words is always determined by the quantity of the penultimate syllable, and this may be ascertained from any Latin dictionary:—if the penultimate should be long, it must be accented; if short, the previous syllable must have the accent: and, be it remembered, a vowel before two consonants is always deemed long, though pronounced with the short sound of the English vowel, as the penultimate of Anténna; unless the two consonants are a mute and a liquid,—for then the previous vowel may be short, and consequently unaccented, as in cerébrum. Greek words, as to their accent, are pronounced as coming to us through the Latin, and consequently by the same rules; though exceptions sometimes occur. (See 86.) With regard to Latinized names in modern science, many of which have a form half Latin, half English, it is absurd to tie them to any classical law:—their current will be their proper pronunciation, be it in other respects what it may; as baryta, iodine, &c. In the sounds of letters, also, it is usual to pronounce Greek words as coming to us through the Latin; and, though our mode of pronouncing Latin must be admitted to be absurd,¹⁶⁹ yet we must adhere to it, unless we could produce a total change; since an attempt to correct by piecemeal would introduce further inconsistencies, and render “confusion worse confounded.” The sound of g in Latin, as in English words, by common consent is hard before a, o, and u, soft before e, i, and y; such also is the practice with regard to the greater number of adopted Greek words, and the practice must be followed unless the speaker chooses to involve himself in inextricable inconsistency. It is of no use, for instance, to pronounce the g hard in gymnastics, gynecocracy, and a few other words from the Greek, unless the speaker followed the same practice in words of more common occurrence, as genealogy, geology, and the like. True, he may establish the less usual sound of g with regard to a word or two, and a dictionary like this may be compelled to reflect that pronunciation; but more justice will be done to our language, and more credit will be due to the speaker, if, when a word hangs between either practice, he prefers that pronunciation which makes it harmonize with the majority of words in the same predicament.

170. The affectation of using French and Italian words in English speech, was a national failing as far back as the times of Elizabeth, and it continues to this day. At their first introduction, such words are pronounced, or attempted to be pronounced, without corruption of their original sounds; by being much used they gradually resign their foreign cast, and some of them at length become quite English. It must therefore happen, while in transition from one of these states to the other, that they will be neither English nor foreign; a condition it were bootless to complain of,—injudicious to alter by going back to the original pronunciation,—and quixotic to amend by reducing them at once to the state of English words. In this condition will the greater part of the words be found that bear a reference in the dictionary to the present section.¹⁷⁰ Of others, which retain their foreign sounds, it is impossible to mark the pronunciation precisely; and the following directions are important in connection with the spelling, the accents, and other marks, by which an approximation to the proper pronunciation is attempted.

In ITALIAN words, the accented syllable must be humoured, so to speak, that is, it must be ¹⁶⁹ The absurdity is not that we give English sounds to the Latin letters, but that we vary the sound of the same letter, subjecting it to every change which it is liable to in English words; and what these changes are, how many, how conflicting, how capricious, the foregoing long development of principles may testify.

¹⁷⁰ The same statement applies to foreign proper names of places; many of them have a medium pronunciation, which it is prudent to encourage as a means of making them at last quite English. The names of almost all the considerable cities abroad are already English in pronunciation, if not always in spelling; and not a few have conformed in spelling as English words to their previously established English sounds. When a choice can be made (it certainly cannot always) between an English and a foreign sound of a foreign name, it is a petty and contemptible taste which, in English society, prefers the latter.

dwelt upon in a marked manner, whether it terminate in a vowel or a consonant; for instance, the o in curio'so, (-ō'zō), and the ed in arpeggio, (arpéd'jō), in which last word the tongue rests upon the d for some time. So in the doubled consonants, as ll, nn, &c., the tongue, by resting on the sound at the place of contact, must mark the difference between the articulation, signified in this manner, and the same articulation signified by the single letter. In other respects, Italian sounds may be tolerably conveyed by English modes of spelling; and consequently, when the Italian pronunciation is not imitated by the spelling, (as in concerto, which is not marked cōnchér'tō), the reason is, that the English pronunciation is deemed to have won its way into good and general use.

IN FRENCH words,—

The r must be trilled or made rough at all times; for instance, in the final syllables marked twár and tur, in abaltoir, and amateur; nor must these syllables be short, but have the full prolongation of English syllables under the accent and lengthened by guttural vibration.

The syllables marked ōng, āng, ūng, ōang, as in enceinte, (ōng-sāngt'), un cordon, (ūng cor'dōang), must not be articulated according to the manner of sounding ng in English words, but the nasal tone must rest in, not pass through, the nose, and the tongue must be quiescent, not carried back as if to articulate letter g. The true French sound is in fact not in any degree a consonant sound, but a nasal vowel.

The sound of u, marked 'oo, 'ōo, or 'ōō, must not be uttered as in pronouncing English words, but the lips must be contracted as if for whistling, and indeed the proper sound of the French u is not improperly described by calling it a vocalized whistle.

The sound marked d, as in aid-de-camp, (aid'-dd-cōng), is meant for the same obscure sound which the a and o denote in the English phrases—twenty pounds a year, what's a clock? &c.

The sound marked ōō, as in the last syllable of accoucheuse, (-ōōz), must be so blended as to seem a single sound, the ōō, by such blending, losing its full pouring utterance, and approaching the narrow sound of the French u as described above.

French words have no decided accent: hence the accent is not always marked on the last syllable, which is wrongly deemed the universal seat of French accent. The last syllable, however, is frequently marked with a long quantity, when the accent is placed on another syllable with no indication of length; and this procedure is adopted as the best mode of conveying the real effect, namely, accent, which is unaccompanied by the effect of English accent,—quantity not produced by the ordinary cause of English quantity.

171. Before taking leave of "the Elements of Syllables," it seems expedient to recapitulate the legitimate uses of the silent letters, which, in the dictionary, are printed a, e, i, o, u, y, w, h.

a, e, i, o, u, y, following a vowel, imply the alphabetical sound of that vowel; as in mēal, char'cōal; flūa, fōas, dūas; pāin, ēther, sūt; brōoch, dōor; sōul; bowl; plāy, kēy.

It must be noted, however, that the effect in some of these instances is unusual, and in that respect illegitimate; for example, in brooch and door, oo being properly a digraph representative of the 27th or 28th element of the vowel scheme: so also with regard to the particular combinations oi and oy, ow and ow, the latter vowel is not generally or legitimately significant of the alphabetic sound of the former vowel, but the two letters form the legitimate digraphs by which the 29th or 30th, the 31st or 32d elements, are represented.

With regard, likewise, to the particular combination aw, the latter letter is not significant of the first or alphabetic sound of the former, but of its fourth sound, as in lāw, jack'-dāw.

h, silent after a, implies that it is to have its third sound as in āh, Messidh.

c, after a consonant preceded by a vowel in the same syllable, implies that the previous vowel loses its second, or short sound, and regains its first or alphabetic sound: thus the short or second sound of the vowel-letter in māt, mēt, fīn, hōp, cūb, gives place to the alphabetic sound in māte or play'-māte, in mēt, fīn, hōpe, and cūbe. This effect is equally legitimate in bāth, tīth, clōth, &c., because th is a digraph, or mark for a single consonant element; but it is not so legitimate in pāste, strānge, &c., though quite as customary.

e, after g and c, implies the soft sound of the consonant-letter; as in age, cringe; ac, mince. And when silent after s and a liquid, it restrains the s from its vocal sound; as in else, tense, curse, which are prevented from identifying in sound with ells, tens, and currs. Also, by being added to th, it implies that the sound is to be vocalized; as, by adding e to the noun breath, we get the verb To breathe.

u, after g and c, keeps the g from becoming soft; as in guess, guide, biscuit. In plāgue, vōgue, fūgue, &c., we may remark that each silent letter has a legitimate effect; for the u keeps the g hard, and the e gives the long sound to the previous vowel. But these effects must not always be calculated upon: in a'-gue, for instance, the last three letters form a distinct syllable; and these two letters, namely u and e, both together and separately, are liable to be idle as well as silent: see 189.

Synepy—Rhythm—Modulation.

172. It is not usual, in a pronouncing dictionary, to regard the principles of pronunciation further than as concerned with words uttered separately. But in discourse, words are not used separately; they unite with various degrees of connection in sense; they unite correspondently in manner of delivery; and he who would understand in theory, or acquire practically, the pronunciation of a living language, must not stop short when he knows how each word is sounded in its individual capacity, but inquire what are the things which, beside syllables, reach the ear in a connected succession of words, and how, as to these things, the language under review is distinguished from others. In the first place the Synepy itself—the interjunction of the words—should be attended to. Because words are separated from each other in writing, we are apt to imagine that a correspondent separation, or something akin to such separation, exists in speaking: but this is entirely a mistake:—as a general assertion it may be safely said, there is no greater separation among the words of the same sentence than among the syllables of the same word; so that a sentence properly uttered is, in fact, an unbroken chain of syllables, except where the lungs, subjecting their necessities to the accommodated demands of sense, and pathos, and harmony, require places of momentary rest, and form what are called the clauses of the sentence.

173. Viewing a sentence, then, in this light, namely, as an unbroken chain of syllables, and having already considered syllable one of the three elements alluded to in the Introduction to these Principles, we may now advert, as briefly as the subjects will permit, to the remaining two, namely, Time, or Rhythm, and Tone, or Modulation. In no language can a succession of connected words, (and words consist of syllables,) be naturally and agreeably pronounced if a sense of rhythmical distribution be wanting. In no language can a succession of words intended to convey a meaning be naturally spoken in a tone or tones like those of song—or sung in tones like those of speech. The tones of speech, then, are essentially different from those of song; in fact, they are slides constantly moving from grave to acute, and acute to grave, but never resting for an instant at any part of the musical scale. Such are the tones of speech in all languages now spoken, and such no doubt they have ever been: such, too, is the necessity, which, in all languages, must produce a rhythm. Still we have to inquire, concerning languages in particular, first, how the rhythm in each is obtained; and, secondly, how the notes of the speaking voice are so modulated as to produce, in each language, what is called the native accent.

174. To the former of these questions, it may be answered without hesitation, that the rhythm of all the modern European languages, French excepted, arises out of the fixed and regulated places of accent which are found in every succession of words. Thus in the sentence, “In the beginning, God created the heavens and the earth,” there are certain fixed places of accent, namely, the syllables in italic, and it is out of these the rhythm arises. The ancient classical languages had, like our own, fixed and regulated seats of accent; but they who then spoke those languages, neglecting the rhythm which was obtainable, and which we obtain from accent, obtained a more subtle and a more musical rhythm from another source, namely, from fixed and regulated quantities. Here, in truth, lies the essential difference between Greek and Latin, as they were originally, and as they are now pronounced, not in the nature and primary purpose of accent, which were the same with them as they are with us, but in the perception of a rhythm independent of the accents. We may pretend as much as we will, in modern times, to read according to quantity; but trained as our ears are, tempered as are our nerves, to the observance of a rhythm arising from a source essentially different, success in such an attempt is next to impossible;—at least, ὡς τὸν βυλλόμενον τὰ ἀναπρότερον ἡμῶν ἰσχυροῦς διδάσκειται γὰρ. Demosthenes speaks of ears politically diseased—ours are prosodically so; and no training which comes late in life can cure them. While accents are heard such as customarily give existence to our perceptions of rhythm, we are practically, audibly, inattentive to quantities, let us, theoretically and literally, attend as closely to them as we may. In our language, accordingly, we have no regulated quantities: we have syllables, indeed, of every quantity from very short to very long, but we have no standard quantities to which the ear appeals in every succession of syllables, and out of which the rhythm arises. Our feet are formed of syllables accented and unaccented, the quantities of which are accidental, and make little or no difference, provided the conditions regarding accent are complied with. Hence, what we call Iambic verse in our language, and what we call Anapæstic verse, have a rhythm completely different from that which reached the ear of an ancient Greek or Roman, while listening to verse of those denominations in his own language, and as it was then pronounced. With us, Iambic verse, as its feet are disyllabic, has the even rhythm marked $\frac{2}{2}$ in music; and Anapæstic verse, as its feet are trisyllabic, has the triple rhythm marked $\frac{3}{2}$; while, to the Greek or Roman, the rhythm of the former was triple, and of the latter even; for the Iamb was a foot of three times, or $\bullet \circ$, and the Anapæst, of four times, or $\bullet \bullet \circ$. Thus different, with respect to the source whence we derive our rhythm, are the languages of modern days—Italian, Romanic, Spanish, English, German, &c., from those of Greece and Rome, as they were anciently spoken. But the French language stands in still stronger contrast: it is not only without any regulated quantities out of which rhythm can arise, but it is also without regulated accents:—to the ear alone, unassisted by the understanding, it is a language of syllables, and hence it is incapable of any but of rhymed verse. Not that it is destitute of rhythm, or of modulated speaking tones, but it is destitute of any regulated seats of accent that force the rhythm now to be of one character, and now of another. Undetermined either by fixed quantities or fixed seats of accent, the rhythm is such as is suggested to the speaker at the moment by the length of clauses or of lines, or the relation of clause to clause, or line to line:¹⁷⁴ in other words, there are no necessary accents, and hence a rhythm, but there is necessarily a rhythm, and hence there are syllables, some under thesis, or pulsation, and some under arsis, or remission. With respect to our own language, (for the better understanding of which, these remarks on others are made,) we find the thesis, or pulsation, (actual or mental,) never taking place but at the syllables previously fixed for accent by the idiom of the language; and further inquiry and examination will show, that the slides of the voice from grave to acute, or acute to grave, are renewed or changed at these syllables, and at these syllables only. Our example may be the one lately quoted—"In the beginning, God created the heavens and the earth:" in the idiomatic pronunciation of this, there is a change of slide as well as a rhythmical cadence at the fourth syllable of the sentence; a renewal of the former slide, or a change to the opposite one, accompanied by another cadence, at the eighth syllable; and so to the end. Hence we may suspect the kind of answer which the second of the two questions proposed at the end of Section 172 admits of.

175. That question was, "how the notes of the speaker's voice are so modulated, as to produce, in each language, what is called its native accent?" Now it is evident that the changes of accent may not take place in all languages co-incidentally with the rhythmical cadences, and that, even among languages which agree in this feature generally, there may be great differences as to the manner of uttering the accents, and the choice of one or the other at particular parts of sentences. In the ancient classical languages, if the previous remarks concerning them are correct, the changes of accent were not coincident with the rhythmical cadence; in French they are not; which is the reason that, to a French tongue and ear, the regulated accents of other European languages are so remarkably difficult. Narrowing our view to our own language, it will still be necessary to refer to Greek and Latin, because the great ignorance which prevails on the subjects we are considering has been produced by the circumstance, that almost all previous inquirers have been determined to find in, the living utterance of our English tongue, the same elements in the same form and use which they find described in ancient treatises of rhetoric and pronunciation. Taking for granted that, as the ancients had regulated quantities, we must have them also; that as their verse depended on these quantities, ours must likewise depend on them; they tacitly take likewise for granted as an implied consequence, that accent, with us, fulfils no other purpose than it did with them. But this is quite at variance with fact. Accent, with us, is an almost universal efficient. Not only does it join syllables together, signifying how many belong to one word, (its office anciently as now,) but it joins words together, and signifies their relation to each other in a sentence, and it often gives a meaning to words, and clauses, and whole sentences, which, abstractedly, they do not bear. It is, as already stated, the sole producer of our rhythm both in prose and verse; for though it affects the quantity of syllables by making those longer which are by nature long, (see the vowel scheme,) yet it practically draws off all attention from the quantities to fix it solely on the number of syllables that go to a cadence or a clause, a foot, a hemistich, or a verse. In short, as to its nature and office, it agrees with ancient accent only so far as it is applied to words separately and individually, and then it does agree precisely. Pronounce, for instance, the word un-fading: the penultimate is acute in tone compared with the other two syllables, which may therefore by comparison be called grave, and a degree of emphasis accompanying the utterance of the word will give the simple acute a compound character, agreeing with the definition of the ancient circumflex.¹⁷⁵ But all this is true only as regards words separately pronounced: for in English, the moment words are joined into sentences, their accents are liable to change in character, in order to harmonize with, and prepare for, each other; moreover, all monosyllabic words in common use forego their individual accents, and join themselves as enclitics to other words: and not only these, but all words whatever, are liable in the same manner to forego their individual accents, in order that the clause or sentence so pronounced may convey an oblique or extra meaning. Let the words of the following sentence be separately pronounced, and each will have its separate accent, viz., a slide of the voice beginning acute and ending grave; but let them be joined, and their modulation in series will accord with the relation in which they are placed below:

Enter not into

for in thy sight shall no man

The places of the rhythmical pulsations are signified by small capitals; and it will be 174 For light social intercourse, French is an unequalled language; and this is no trivial recommendation; but for any other purpose, it stands by far the lowest of all the languages of Europe. It is unfit for poetry and oratory; and the wonder is, that there are French poets and French orators. I am well aware, that if I had hazarded such an assertion in the presence of my early French master, M. Des Carrières, his hair would have stood on end: I am equally aware of what I may expect from my long-valued friend M. Merlet, the French Professor at the London University—a Parisian, who, to a thorough acquaintance with the refinements of his own language and literature, joins a sound knowledge of ours:—but I brave the consequences.

175 Greek words accented on the last are called oxytons, and those not so accented are called barytons, by which last word is meant that they had the grave accent on the last, the acute being elsewhere placed. Why, then, it may be asked, was the mark called grave placed seen that the changes of slide begin at those places: it will also be observed that many of the words have now no accent of their own, but participate in the slide which commences with some previous word; while, of the words which retain an accent of their own, it will be seen that the accent is not always of the same character as of the word separately pronounced; that is, beginning acute and ending grave; but each accent is uttered relatively to others, and this adjusted relation of the accents throughout the clauses constitutes the modulation of the sentence. We have no reason to think the union of words into sentences was accompanied in the ancient classical languages by these effects. Accent, with them, united syllables into words, but not words into sentences. It was an efficient wholly different that, to the ears of the refined native, brought words into union, and gave the series its rhythm: this efficient was the regulated quantities: to these the nerves of the speaker and bearer were tempered by education and habit, and by these were the rhythmical cadences tacitly determined, not by the accents. The effect as to the union of the words was however the same: for the feet which arose from the quantities had no more regard to the words in their separate capacities than feet which arise from accent,—but the caesura cut off some syllables from one word and some from another, just as the perception of rhythm, arising from the quantities, suggested. Words, therefore, in all probability, retained the accents, when in union, which they had separately, and we know that they seldom dropped their accents: for the number of enclitics, that is, of words privileged to drop their accents, was very limited; proving that the privilege itself scarcely existed. Hence the reason the ancients were so averse to a succession of monosyllabic words; for the repeated similar accents were necessarily tiresome to the ear: but in our language a succession of such words seldom has this effect; for a sentence of monosyllables, having the same rhythm, is also capable of having precisely the same modulation as a sentence composed of long words. The following two sentences, for instance, have exactly the same rhythm and modulation: “Disappointment repeated, destroys expectation.” “To be cross’d in our hopes, is a check we are born to.” It is needless to carry these remarks further; nor would so much on subjects rather foreign to the purpose of a pronouncing dictionary have been said, had it not been necessary to prevent a supposition on the accented syllable of an oxyton unless it came last in a sentence? A correspondent in the 11th vol. of Valpy’s Classical Journal answers this question ingeniously and satisfactorily. When the marks of accents were first used, words were not separated from each other in writing, and these marks were meant for guides to the reader, that he might, by the proper tones, aggregate the syllables into words. But if oxytons had had their proper mark, when they came elsewhere than at the end of a sentence, they might have been mistaken for barytons, and preparation made for unaccented syllables to follow: hence, they were written with a mark different from the true one at all places except at the conclusion of a sentence.

too easily entertained, that to know how every separate word of a language is pronounced, is to know how the language itself is pronounced. It was further necessary to caution the learner, who had reached that first step in the pronunciation of our language, against the false guides he is in danger of meeting with on attempting the second. The assertion is scarcely too harsh, that if almost all which has been written on English accent, emphasis, tone, quantity, rhythm, were cast into the fire, a great service would be done to the learners of our language. Let a learner apply his own ears to catch from English organs the native tones and native rhythm of our language, and he will have every chance of success; a chance he will be almost sure to miss, if he takes any written treatise for his guide. What, for instance, can be better fitted to blind any one to the true nature of English verse, than the Prosodies which pretend to explain it? What have the names of the classical feet to do with metres that depend upon accent? Our verse, in all its varieties, is constructed on principles so simple, that very little needs be said in describing it. To declare that we have verse of such and such a number of syllables to the standard line,—that the rhythm in such line, or in such a clause, is disyllabic or trisyllabic,—that the rhythmical ictus begins with the first syllable of the line, or clause, or does not begin with it,—that it falls or does not fall on the last syllable,—that lines are allowed within certain limits to deviate from their standard, but that, beyond those limits, what was verse becomes prose,—that the clauses of lines relatively to clauses in their own or in other lines, become harmonious by the proportions they suggest,—is to say almost all that the subject requires.

176. As immediately connected with the subjects under review, it is important to state, before they are dismissed, that, in the dictionary, words are marked according to their separate pronunciation, and consequently that all monosyllabic words are exhibited as having accented vowel sounds. But in actual use, a very great proportion of these monosyllabic words are never accented when they enter into sentences, except when some oblique or referential meaning makes them emphatic. The indefinite article which we name a is pronounced ä in actual use and combination: (compare 24:)—that which we pronounce mē as a single word is never so pronounced in sentences except emphatically, (i. e. referentially to you, him, her, &c.) but drops its long quantity so as more properly to be marked mē:—in like manner, your becomes yur; (131;) am, was, had, shall, and, become äm, wöz, häd, shall, änd; (12;) for often becomes fur; (38;) of becomes uv, and from, früm; (18;) my and by generally become mē and bē; (105;) and thy, among people who familiarly use it, frequently becomes thē:—so likewise the definite article, which, when it stands alone, we call thē, shortens and often changes its vowel sound in connection with other words, (except when emphatic,) being pronounced thē when it comes before a vowel sound, and thd, (see 24,) when it comes before a consonant sound :—so again the pronoun you in the accusative case and not emphatic, changes the full sound of its vowel into a sound near to é or to the natural vowel. And not only are the vowel sounds liable to be affected when words are pronounced relatively to, or in connection with, other words, but the consonant t or d concluding a word immediately before another word that begins with the sound of y consonant, not under accent, is liable to be sounded ch or j, just as the t in nature and the d in verdure, are liable to be so sounded. See 147.

177. The reference of words to one in a sentence, is frequently productive of another effect, namely, a deviation from the regular or usual seat of accent. Thus we say, “to give and for-give;” we compare “prob-ability and plau-sibility;” we speak of the “devisor and devisee;” the “appellor and appellee;” &c.

2. PRINCIPLES OF REMEDY

FOR

DEFECTS OF UTTERANCE.

Vulgar and Rustic, Provincial and Foreign Habits.

178. Before anything is said respecting the several defects which rank under the foregoing denominations, it may be as well to consider what is that dialect from which they all deviate, and how far it is possible, and worth the while of a sensible person, to surmount his early habits in order to conform to it. The dialect, then, which we have here in view, is not that which belongs exclusively to one place,—not even to London; for the mere cockney, even though tolerably educated, has his peculiarities as well as the mere Scotchman or Irishman;—but the common standard dialect is that in which all marks of a particular place of birth and residence are lost, and nothing appears to indicate any other habits of intercourse than with the well-bred and well-informed, wherever they may be found. Now it may be that a person cannot altogether reach this standard; but if he reach it very nearly, all the object of a complete conformity may be gained. A person needs not blush because he cannot help betraying he is a Scotchman or an Irishman; but it may nevertheless be an object of ambition to prove that his circle of intercourse has extended much beyond his native place. Accordingly, a Scotch or Irish accent is grating on polite ears only in excess, and has nothing disagreeable in it, if individual words are sounded according to common usage, and the broadness of the accent has evidently been reduced by intercourse with varied society. Still greater indulgence is allowed to a foreign accent, though this of course diminishes with known length of abode in the country where the language is spoken. But a rustic or a cockney dialect meets not with the same quarter; and a man displaying either the one or the other, must have a large portion of natural talent or acquired science, who surmounts the prejudice it creates. These remarks may serve as an answer to one part of the question proposed,—namely, how far it is worth a sensible person's while to labour at the improvement of a deficient pronunciation; and with regard to the possibility of success, the person will be able to form his own opinion after he shall have considered the strength and inveteracy of his present habits, and the degree in which they stand opposed to the principles and practice exhibited in the foregoing pages. Whatever may be the nature of his deficiency,—cockney, rustic, Irish, Scotch, or foreign,—his first step should be the mastery of the key sounds in the schemes, under the guidance of some one that pronounces them quite correctly. Then, and not till then, he will be able to read the treatise and use the dictionary, with every chance of ultimate success. A few hints previously to entering on the course proposed, may render it more effectual to each class of persons just alluded to. We may begin by

179. HINTS TO COCKNEY SPEAKERS. The diffusion of literature among even the lowest classes of the metropolis, renders it almost unnecessary to speak now of such extreme vulgarisms as the substitution of v for w, or w for v. Few persons under forty years of age, with such a predilection for literary nicety as will lead them to these pages, can be in much danger of saying, that they like “Weal and winegar very well;” or that they are going to “Vest Vickham in a po shay;” and with regard to men who, in spite of their intelligence and information, retain the habits of a more distant generation of cocknies, it is doubtful whether, at their age, a reformation could be promised without an expense of time and labour they would be unwilling to bestow. They may be referred to the organic formation of the sounds where the deficiencies lie,—to the exercise of the organs in lists of words selected for the purpose,—and to the dictionary for the proper utterance of every individual word on which a doubt can occur:—but whether, after these directions, they can find patience to put them in practice, is a consideration for themselves alone. Passing, therefore, to cockneys of a later generation, it may be remarked, that they require, in general, to be cautioned against affected niceties quite as much as against unconscious negligencies. We shall often hear a sedulous cockney say wöild, cöild, and shöild, (would, could, should,) while he sinks, habitually and unwarily, the terminational vowel in chicken and Latin, novel and parcel. Correcting these, he carries his correctness so far as to make the vowel distinct in swivel and heaven, evil and devil. The effort might pass however, and possibly be lauded, if he were consistently exact; but it becomes ridiculous when in contrast with such negligencies as arithmetick and charecter, wri-tin and read-in, spile and sile, (spoil and soil,) Toosday, doo-ty, perput-rate, affn-ut-y, providence, and ed-e-cation. Then, again, what apparent perverseness in sinking the guttural sound of r in board, form, cord, &c., and adding it to law, saw, &c.; in sinking the h in hand, heart, &c., and sounding it in honour, honest, &c. It is evident, then, that the cockney speaker has to learn at least consistency in his pronunciation. If he seek extraordinary accuracy, let him learn the principles on which accuracy depends; and if he desire to be accurate no further than to pass in good society without invidious notice, let him learn the limits between polite and extreme exactitude.—We proceed next to

180. HINTS FOR LONDONIZING A RUSTIC UTTERANCE. Although a rustic pronunciation differs much in one county and in another, yet in all of them the vowels are apt to be broader than the standard dialect permits,—that is to say, they are uttered with a wider aperture of the mouth; and to this broader sound is generally added a drawl, which, occurring on sounds that should be essentially short, changes their character in this respect also. The specific sounds of the several vowels must, therefore, be diligently and practically studied in the scheme, before an attempt at improvement is made by the use of the Principles foregoing, or the subsequent dictionary; and the most watchful attention should gather into classes, words that contain the same vowel sound under different vowel characters, or different circumstances. For instance: “I have won one game, and you have won none; you have not won once, and that is wonderful.” Here the words and syllables which have the vowel ü under the letter o, should be collected and practised. The classes of words in which a vowel-letter has some incidental sound not extending beyond the class, should also be collected: for example, the words in which letter u is sounded ö, instead of ü; (see 117;) in order that, when the Yorkshireman, for instance, is no longer guilty of saying döö for düll, he may not carry the change so far as to say büll, &c., for böö. Exceptions will indeed require more attention than the general rules:—avönge, hänge, spünge, &c., might, for instance, lead a west countryman to think he is right in saying stränge and dän-ger; but he must learn the rule which excepts these. (111.) Nor, while attending to vowel-sounds, must the consonants be neglected. Welshmen make the hard or breath consonants soft, and the soft, hard; Somersetshiremen sound x for s; the Northumbrians trill the r against the soft palate instead of the upper gum, and so pronounce it with a burr; while the Lancastrians make a compound of the simple articulation ng, and, instead of king, long, &c., say king-g, long-g, &c. (Compare 158.)—Our next duty is to give

181. HINTS FOR SOFTENING AN HIBERNIAN BROGUE. The first point our western friend must attend to for this purpose, is, to avoid hurling out his words with a superfluous quantity of breath. It is not broadher and loudher that he must say; but the d, and every other consonant in the language, must be neatly delivered by the tongue, with as little riot, clattering, or breathing as possible. Next let him drop the roughness or rolling of letter r in all places but the beginning of syllables: he must not say slor-rum and far-rum, but let the word be heard in one smooth syllable. The numerous interchanges he will have to make among the vowels it will be impossible to particularize,—such, for instance, as will convert plaze into please, greet into great, plinty into plenty, ful into foot; they are merely hinted at here to awaken his observation; and it is unnecessary to tell him he may find an abundance of similar hints, combined with infinite humour, in many a tale written by countrymen and countrywomen; which he is advised to study in connection with these remarks, if for nothing else, as a relief to their dryness.—One more observation may be added:—in modulating his sentences, the Irishman does not make that equal use of the two accents of the speaking voice which characterizes the common standard dialect, but his accents are almost all in one direction, viz., from acute to grave. Thus warned, his ear, on the watch to catch the difference, may enable him to change his habit. Turning to the north, we are next to furnish

182. HINTS FOR REDUCING BROAD SCOTCH. An Irishman, it has just been observed, uses the closing accent of the voice too much: a Scotchman has the contrary habit, and is continually drawing his tones from grave to acute with an effect, which, to southern ears, is suspensive in character. The smooth guttural r is as little heard in Scotland as in Ireland, the trilled r taking its place; and the substitution of the former for the latter at the places indicated by the vowel scheme, must therefore be an object of sedulous practice. The peculiar sound of u, which in the north so often borders on the French u, must be compared with the several sounds of the letter as heard in the south; and the long quantity which a Scotchman is apt to give the vowels that ought to be essentially short, must be clipped by the instantaneous junction of the consonant, in order that æ may become ø, or ā; ā may become ē; ē may be shut up into i; ō alter its length and quality into ö; and œ be curtailed into œ. On the other hand, equal care will be necessary to keep the vowels which ought to be long completely so: lāt must not be shortened almost into lēt, nor lēan into lin; neither cōal into cōle, nor fōod into fōd. The composition of the long i, which in Scotland is sounded ā, must also be attended to. In short, all the key sounds must first be completely mastered, and the preceding pages consulted respecting the application of them in detail.—The remarks under these several heads have anticipated almost all that can be offered in the shape of

183. HINTS TO FOREIGNERS. A parallel of sounds will be found in almost every foreign-anglo grammar, and needs not, therefore, be furnished here: but it may be useful to warn the learner of our language, never to depend on any parallel further than for an approximation of sounds. Let a vowel in our language be pronounced by a correct English mouth, and compared with one in his own language, as pronounced by himself, and, however his grammar may tell him they are identical, he will be almost sure to find, with sharp ears and awakened attention, a difference of sound and effect well worth remembering. And not only are almost all the vowels, and some of the consonants, foreign to foreign organs, but the accent or modulation of the language is new and strange, particularly to a Frenchman. The reading of verse after a well-taught native is the best way to give a practical feeling of the nature and application of this last element.

Defects of Articulation.

184. All impediments of speech, as they are called, proceed from the constant, or the inconstant inability of the organs to complete certain articulations. The former kind may be considered under the head now proposed: the latter defect will be considered separately. The actions of the organs of speech, which, accompanied by breath or voice, constitute the articulations, are as determinate, and fitted to be as much under the control of the will, as the actions of our arms, hands, fingers, legs, or feet; and it needs not be pointed out, that whenever we would bring any of these members to perform unaccustomed actions, we first make ourselves accurately acquainted with the manner of action, and then, by frequent and incessant repetition, render the action, or series of actions, a habit. In this way we learn steps in dancing, and fingering in music. The members may be perhaps by nature ill adapted for the actions; in which case, though the difficulty of gaining the habit may be great, yet it may not be insurmountable. Even if some of the members usually employed are wanting, the case is not always hopeless: if a man has lost his right hand, we can teach him to write with his left. The organs of speech are not excepted from the force of these general remarks. He who has impediments to correct must first ascertain what articulations he is unable to form, and why he is unable:—in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, the cause will not be found to lie in any natural indisposition or inaptitude of the organs, but in the accidental acquirement of a wrong habit for the right one. Thus a habit of touching the teeth instead of the gum in pronouncing s, is the fault called lisping. Nosology, indeed, has taken this and the other defects under its cognizance, and given them high-sounding Græco-latin names; but they are diseases caught from example, and are hardly ever constitutional. The lip, accompanied by a general want of energy in the action of the tongue, lips, teeth, &c., constitutes the pellismus emolliens. If the fault attaches chiefly to the r, either by the omission of its sound altogether or the substitution of a weaker sound like l, it is called pellismus lallans. The well-known Newcastle burr, (compare 73,) is dignified by the title pellismus ringens. The divided palate is fairly claimed by nosology, under the name of pellismus lagostomatium; a defect of conformation which renders the speaker incapable without mechanical aid of rendering k, g, and ng articulate. The tongue is frequently accused (often groundlessly) of being too big or too little, and certain it is that it sometimes borrows too much assistance from the lips, while its own action is sluggish and unwieldy. This is called pellismus balbutiens. The lips are sometimes defective, so as to pronounce p, b, and m, imperfectly. This is called pellismus acheilos. There appears to be no distinct name for the stoppage of the nasal organ, which converts ng, m, and n into g, b, and d; and indeed a surgeon's assistance is less frequently wanted in the case than a pocket-handkerchief. In short, it is evident that, in far the greater part of these cases, the patient may work his own cure, by learning what he has to do, by trying to do it at first considerably and slowly, and afterwards, by degrees, rapidly. Even when some part of the necessary organs is wanting, a little trial may enable him to do that with another part which cannot be done with the part missing. If, while placing his tongue in the usual place to sound s, he cannot help lisping because he has lost a tooth, either let him get a tooth supplied by a dentist, or try whether, by putting the tongue higher in the mouth, a hiss without a lisp is not possible. If, because the palate and uvula are divided, the sounds of k, g, and ng lose all their distinctness by escaping at the nose, let him try whether, by something to pinch the nose, —spectacles, for instance,—he cannot make them plainer. This, it is true, will be mending one defect by incurring another: but at least it offers a choice of evils, and, of the two, the obstructed nasal tone is of less moment than an entire inability to render words intelligible which contain the palatal consonants.

Prothimus hesitans, or Stammering.

185. In a work like this, a few hints may be given to stammerers, if for no other purpose, to guard them against delusion in seeking for a cure.—Stammering, when not of the slight kind which is caught from example merely, and fostered by negligence, has its origin in extreme excitability of nerve, and consequent liability to sudden trepidation; a species of constitution which renders the stammerer a striking mark for quackery. For, (excepting cases where the faulty action of the muscles has been confirmed by inveterate habit,) the stammerer does not always stammer, but pronounces smoothly enough while under no apprehension, anxiety, or uneasiness. Therefore, whatever he is told will give him the power to speak without difficulty, if at the same time he is persuaded to have entire confidence in it, will, while his confidence lasts, have the effect. The misfortune will be, that if his confidence have no rational foundation, but rest on blind belief alone, it will be liable to waver; and every consequent failure will lessen its power, till the spell is quite broken. Instead, therefore, of any mysterious means by which stammering is often said to be cured, it will be better to adopt a plan that shall give the speaker a rational confidence in his own powers; as an introduction to which, three things are here proposed: 1. To explain the nature of the process in which he fails;—2. Why he more than others is liable to fail in it;—3. What kind of exercise must by its nature tend to reduce that liability. First, then, for the nature of the process in which he fails. The smooth utterance of a sentence in discourse, is a series of simultaneous actions of the will and of the muscles alternately, each action being both an effect and a cause—the effect of what went before, the cause of what follows: and these actions operate in this way on each other, not because they are originally connected, except as regards the operation of the will on the muscles, but because long practice has established the connection. The dexterity acquired in every art, equally comes under this description. The musical practitioner, for instance, has no sooner sounded the first note of a tune, than that note, through the connection which practice has established, is the cause of the second, by suggesting primarily the next note to the mind, and thus secondarily inducing a will to move muscles which produce the second; and so on through the tune. Before the connection here described is established, every act of the will springs from antecedents of a much more remote and unready kind, and the performance is therefore very slow and laborious. We have now in view a series of actions merely imitative. But the case is not different when the composition of the series is original. For an original work, in whatever department of art, is original only as a whole: there is no order or law of connection among the component parts with which the composer, be he orator, poet, painter, or musician, is not completely familiar; and it is because he is familiar, practically familiar with the laws of composition appertaining to his art, that he is able to let his fancy range in bringing well-known elements together under new general forms. To apply this general doctrine to the process under consideration:—He who speaks smoothly is enabled to proceed from sound to sound uninterruptedly through his sentences, because, the moment his muscles have completed one action, they operate on the will toward the production of the next; that next being one that has so often followed the previous one as to have established the certainty of the effect, all other circumstances being equal. But if some emotion should arise, the mental impetus being drawn off from what it was about to produce, may leave the series of articulations incomplete; or should a diverse purpose affect the will just strong enough to put in motion a new set of muscles, but not decided enough to have previously stopped the series of actions in progress, the effect will be spasm, or an action of the muscles independently of the will: and in this manner are the most fluent occasionally liable to hesitate, and the most confident to stammer. But, secondly, why should the stammerer be more liable to these effects than another? Evidently, because his constitution disposes him more than another to the causes:—he is peculiarly liable to sudden emotion, and to momentary vacillation of purpose. But this is not all:—the connection between the muscular action, and the will which is to produce the next action, is weaker in him than in another, because he has frequently failed in it; nay, if he fails very frequently, there will, at last, be no connection at all, but, on the contrary, there will be a connection between the muscular action, and the spasm that has so often followed it, the spasm, in this manner, from having at first been accidental only, becoming a part of the series. Now, in laying down, thirdly, a plan of discipline for the cure of a stammerer, it will be going too far to promise that he shall not be liable to stammer from such feelings or such mental causes as make others stammer; and moral exertion, aided, if necessary, by means to strengthen the constitution, must be called in to reduce the frequency of the natural occasions. But the habit which their frequency has generated, and which exists independently of their occurrence, this may be removed;—a complete control may be regained by the will over those muscles originally subjected to its power;—and a connection may be established between muscular actions, and the will to produce following actions, such as shall never fail while the mind retains its tranquillity and its purpose. The most effectual way of breaking the old habit will be, to cease utterance altogether, except for the express purpose or trying to utter well. And let a beginning be made with the separate elements of articulation, in order that the manner of forming each may be completely understood. Utter the vowels which are essentially long,—ā, āh, āw, ē, ī, ō, oy, ow, with a full, firm, decided tone. The stammerer will find he has complete control over these, either to continue or discontinue them. Let him, moreover, observe, how nature teaches him, to regulate his breathing in uttering these sounds; that his lungs are well replenished with air when he commences a sound with the intention of prolonging it,—that this air is the material out of which he creates the sound;—and that he draws in a fresh supply to begin a new protracted sound. To this lesson let him be attentive in every part of his subsequent exercises, and periodically supply himself with breath, as now for the separate sounds, so hereafter for series of sounds, at easy clausular intervals.¹⁸³ After the vowels essentially long, the consonants must be formed according to the description of each, with a distinct consciousness of the organic action in each instance. He must satisfy himself that his tongue, lips, teeth, gums, palate, &c., are, by nature, as much under his own control, as, at other times, his hands and fingers; and with this conviction let him practise, not the names of the consonants, but the motions of the organs of speech required by each consonant, accompanied by an utterance of breath or of voice, as the nature of each may require. Let him touch the organs with his fingers, or look at their motion in a glass, if such methods assist him; and, in short, omit nothing which may render him theoretically as well as practically familiar with the process of articulation: for on such knowledge is to be built that rational confidence in his powers, which is to be mainly instrumental to his cure.—Familiar with the independent vowels, and knowing the nature of the consonants separately from their names, and from their junction with vowels of any sort,—the process of joining these elements together is to be the next subject of conscious exertion. Let him begin with the vowels followed by the consonants;—this connection is seldom accompanied by failure;—let the connection of every vowel with every consonant be tried again and again, (k, w, and y, be it remembered, are not consonants under the circumstance proposed,) till the manner of connection is quite familiar, both theoretically and practically. The non-independent vowels, i. e. those essentially short, may next be tried, each with every consonant, (still remembering that k, w, and y are consonants only at the beginning of syllables; and that r must now be excluded, because it never makes a previous vowel essentially short, unless it is also articulated on a following syllable.) The next connection to be regarded will be that of consonants with vowels following them. Here, between some of the sounds intended to be joined, his habitual spasms either always or frequently occurs. This is what he has to remove, and in its place to fix the contrary habit; and he will succeed in proportion to the patience and perseverance he employs. First, the spasm must be prevented by the most watchful control of the muscles, and by contrivances of the following kind:—suppose the connection desired is between k and a, as in the first syllable of capable; but that while the back of the tongue touches the soft palate, a spasm occurs, and the a cannot instantly be joined;—let another trial be made, but previously to the k, join the simple aspirate to the a, that is, pronounce the syllable ha: repeat this syllable frequently, and while repeating, bring the proper part of the tongue nearer and nearer to the soft palate, till at last it touches it. In this manner, while the purpose was that of saying ha, the effect will be to have said ka, and by this kind of cheat on himself, he will have escaped the spasm. Let him repeat the experiment till he has transferred to the will what was at first accomplished without the will. Not even then is his purpose gained; but long laborious repetition must make the effort of the will an effect of what precedes it, in place of the spasm which has hitherto been the effect. And what is to be achieved as to the connection between k and a, which is supposed for the sake of example, must be achieved wherever spasm habitually or frequently occurs. From the junction of sounds into syllables, he must proceed to that of syllables into words, and of words into clauses. In this stage of his progress, let him avail himself to the utmost of the principle of rhythm. Wherever two or more syllables are joined together in harmonious pronunciation, a sense of pulsation and remission accompanies their progress, (173,) and to the improvement of this sense the stammerer should be diligently attentive. Let him keep time to his accents, and regulate his pauses, drawing in supplies of breath at places not irregularly distant, and he will march through sentences securely. Some formality of manner may accompany the effect; but this will hardly be regretted, if smoothness and continuity should be a part of what is gained ¹⁸³ A surgeon, some little time ago, published a treatise to establish that stammering arises from attempting to speak while the lungs are in a state of collapse. I do not believe that a stammerer, in this respect, differs from other people; and it is plain, I think, that, under ordinary circumstances, we never exhaust the lungs so completely of air as to be unable, from that cause, to begin speaking at any moment. But I believe that the moment any one attempts to speak, he puts in action certain muscles near the region of the lungs by which to restrain the issue of the breath, so that only just so much shall escape as is necessary to speech, which, by the bye, is much less in quantity than is commonly thought. Now, a stammerer, in the flutter of his spirits, is apt to overdo this matter, and to make the embargo complete instead of partial. Hence, his immediate organs of articulation are often at work with convulsive action when there is no material ready for them on which to operate. And hence also, because he cannot get the material by expiration, we often find him endeavouring to vocalize an inspiration.

3. PRINCIPLES OF ORTHOGRAPHY.

186. It is not intended under this head to lay down any principles of orthography at variance with present usage, nor, in the dictionary, will any attempt be made to establish unusual modes of spelling, however recommended by reason or propriety, (one or two instances hereafter noticed scarcely amount to exceptions,) but the written English language, as the oral, will be represented in its actual state with as much fidelity as possible. By the schemes, the principles following them, and the manner of indicating the pronunciation of words in the dictionary, it is however expected that much light will be thrown on the inconsistencies of our spelling, so as to show the direction that any changes, if any are made, ought to take. For this end, the present dictionary differs purposely from others, which, in spelling words according to their sounds, disregard the ordinary laws of spelling in order to give to every single sound its single character or indication. Such was the plan proposed by Sheridan in his dictionary, though it was very imperfectly fulfilled; such too was Walker's plan, though still further from being realized; it is, in fact, a plan that cannot be realized entirely, unless characters are invented for certain simple elements, e. g. for ng, th, sh, and zh, which, being invented, would not be understood. In the present dictionary, the plan thus imperfectly acted upon by others is altogether given up, and instead of it, those modes of indicating the pronunciation of words are adopted, which are consonant to the ordinary or most general laws of spelling, a word being considered irregular when its sounds appear under other modes of representation than those exhibited in the schemes. To explain this part of the general design more fully, and supply what may appear defective in the execution of it, is the object of what follows under the present head.

187. Words spelled and pronounced in correspondence with the schemes, are, of course, deemed quite regular in their orthography, and such, if leading words, are accordingly followed by the same or by an equivalent spelling, the mark (=) standing between:—if they are not leading words, they will be found free from italic letters, except in unaccented syllables, where the vowel often appears in italic to signify the corruption it is liable to receive from not being pronounced with the distinctness of an accented vowel. But,

188. The foregoing are not the only words that must be considered regular in their spelling. For reasons of mere convenience, those spelled with x and with qu are excluded from the schemes; and such words appear therefore in the dictionary as being irregular in spelling. Yet when x is pronounced as in mix (micks) and qu as in quake, (kwäkt), the spelling must be understood as perfectly conformable to the general laws of the language; and indeed, with regard to the latter instance, the combination of letters, kw, is, as a combination, altogether alien to an English eye, the combined sounds included in it being legitimately represented only by qu. On the other hand, when x is pronounced as in Xenophon, (Zénophon), and qu as in opaque, (opake), the letters as compared with the sounds they here receive, are properly deemed irregular.

189. Letter e when idle as well as silent, has been considered an irregularity in the principles preceding. Some exceptions, however, must be made. It seems to be a principle, or at least a universal practice in our language, not merely that i, but that u and v (originally the same) shall never finish a word. Accordingly we write a-gue, virtue, salve, starve, &c.; and though the e is quite useless, yet even in an unfamiliar word, every English eye would require its presence in the like situations. So again, the e appears quite useless in browse, lapse, glimpse, &c.; yet if taken away, the words would have the semblance of nouns plural, and on this account, if on no other, the presence of the e may be justified and the words deemed regular in spelling. It is with some repugnance that even letter o is allowed to finish a word: we write foe, doe, toe, &c., and though Johnson writes wo, it is almost as frequently written with an e in the singular, and always in the plural, as are likewise cargo, echo, hero, negro, manifesto, palato, volcano. This is in fact necessary in the plural in order to make the spelling of the last syllable regular, which syllable is clearly irregular in folios, nuncios, &c. The words pedagogue, exargue, grotesque, and others like them, as no use appears for the mute ue with which they terminate, can be sheltered from the charge of very irregular orthography only by classing them with the foregoing examples. Of grotesque it may indeed be said that the q cannot dispense with the u, and the u cannot dispense with the e; but the true English mode of spelling would be grotesk.

190. With regard to deviations from the general laws of spelling that have the sanction of particular rules, it is difficult to say, of many examples, which are, and which are not, the words irregularly spelled or sounded. Are bath and path, (bäth, päth), ball and fall, (bäul, fäul), most, (möost), poll, (pöle), move, (mööv), bull, (bööl), &c., regular? or must we not rather allow the claim of regularity to häth, shäll, fröst, döll, gröve, and düll? It may certainly be contended that the former words do not violate the genius of our language in their spelling and sound, but that they are at variance with its most general laws is plain; and in that predicament the plan of the dictionary considers them. On the same principle the first syllable of i-dea and the last of multi-ply are deemed regular, while the first of i-magine (i-magine) and the last of am-ple (am-plé) are deemed irregular, although it is true that this so called irregular sound of i or y is the sound it usually takes in unaccented syllables.

191. We come next to notice some inconsistencies in the spelling of certain classes of words in our language, which might undoubtedly have been corrected in this dictionary, as they have partially been in others, if the purpose of the work had been to correct, and not to exhibit, the actual orthography of the language. In correspondence with Johnson's practice, supported by that of his last editor, Todd, all the words originally terminating in or and derived from the Latin through the French language, might have been spelled consistently with honour, favour, &c.; but where, except in dictionaries, do we now find error and superior? Or Webster's example with regard to the whole class might have been followed, and the termination in or adopted consistently throughout. Such, however, is not the practice of the day, although some years ago there was a great tendency towards it. The following, indeed, are still inclined to the Latin termination, and some of them so decidedly, that to write them with our would incur the opinion of great singularity, if not of fault: error, emperor, governor, warrior, superior, horror, tremor, dolor, tumor, tenor, clangor, fulgor, savor. Humor in the medical sense is inclined to the Latin form; in its more frequent senses, it continues the termination usual with our old writers. Splendor appears even in Bailey's dictionary in the Latin form, and it is difficult to conceive on what ground modern writers should prefer the other form. Making these exceptions, and adding all such Latin words in or as are scarcely yet naturalized, Johnson's orthography of the words in question will be followed.

192. The same inconsistency, arising from the same cause, attaches to words that in the original Latin commenced with the preposition in. Those among them that have been derived by us through the French language, very commonly, but not always, appear with the French form of that prefix, namely en: but nothing can be more wavering than the practice of writers on this point, and dictionaries increase the uncertainty by giving, in many instances, both forms. In this dictionary one or the other form will always be decidedly adopted; so that the inspector who does not find a word of this class under one head, must seek for it under the other. It may be further mentioned that words in en are also liable in many instances to fluctuate between that, the Latin form, and the French form in an. If there is any kind of a principle to determine a doubt in this case, it is this, that the latter form should be used for the adjective and the abstract substantive derived from it, as dependent, dependence, and the French form for the common substantive noun, as a dependant; but the principle is not consistently acted upon.

193. Much uncertainty also prevails with respect to words of more than one syllable that formerly terminated in ick; the practice of the present day being to drop the superfluous k, not on that account solely, but because the majority of the words are related to correspondent forms in Greek or Latin, which afford no example for doubling the consonant. Johnson indeed, and his editor Todd, spell all these words in the old English fashion; but who now writes music or politics? Some have proposed that the change in question should extend only to words of classical, and not to those of Saxon parentage; and inasmuch as the majority of these last are monosyllables, the distinction is partially observed: yet bishoprick and bailwick often appear without the k. Further, it is to be observed that the final k must be restored in certain derivative forms; for though we write to frolic and to traffic without the k, we cannot dispense with it in frollicking, trafficking, and trafficker. It is remarkable that Webster, who carries the omission of the final k so far as to drop it in bishoprick, restores it in such instances as frollic and traffic, as if the practice of doubling the last consonant (hard c and k are the same) on adding a syllable to a word, were a novelty in our language not to be tolerated in the present case.

194. Of the inconsistencies in our spelling, this very practice of doubling the final consonant on adding a syllable, gives birth to not a few. In most cases, the reason for or against it is plain enough. Thus in adding ed, er, &c., to mat, fit, beft, the t must be doubled, lest we should pronounce ma'-ted, fi'-ter, beft'-led; but it is not doubled in bait-ed, ben'-eft-ed, &c., because if we pronounce bai'-ted, ben'-eft-ed, (ben'-eft-ted), we shall not be far from the true sound, or prevent the meaning from being plain. It is obvious, therefore, that the double p in worshipped, worshipper, &c., the second i in travelling, traveller, &c., are quite unnecessary on any other score than to satisfy the prejudices of the eye; and on this ground alone is the usual spelling retained in the following dictionary.

195. In many cases besides the foregoing, the propriety of dropping one of a double consonant is attended with like doubt, and consequent inconsistency of practice. Every body drops an i in fall and full when compounded as in to befall, and in careful:—are we then to make this practice universal, as we seem inclined to do in foretel, belkral, enrol, &c.? or are these to be considered exceptions, and the general practice to be, the retention of both consonants, as in snowball, handmill, dunghill, &c.? Unfortunately these questions admit not of any satisfactory answer. It is certain that on the first compounding of words, the practice is, to retain the orthography of the primitives; but it is equally certain that these compounds are inclined to drop their superfluous letters after having been long established as distinct words of the language: (compare Prin. 136.) Hence Johnson thought himself justified in spelling with a single final consonant such words as downfal, waterful, dunghil, &c., though he left other words, as recall, molehill, &c., in full possession of all their original letters. In subsequent editions his editors, as to many of the former instances, have restored the original spelling, and the public have generally acquiesced in the change. Yet the original tendency still remains, and many words have yielded to it irreclaimably. With this tendency and its permanent effects on the one side, and the counteracting labours of hosts of verbal critics on the other, entire consistency of practice on this point is hopeless.

196. Such are some of the inconsistencies of our orthography. To these almost every dictionary opposes its schemes of partial improvement; but as no one editor chooses to follow the track of another, the attempts only render the actual practice still more uncertain. Webster, who, to establish his own plans of improvement, sets authority and custom at defiance, might reasonably have been expected to follow Todd's slight infringement of actual practice in the spelling of judgment, abridgment, and acknowledgment, to which Todd restores the omitted e, in order that they may not exhibit the otherwise unexampled irregularity of g soft before a consonant; and this innovation was the more excusable, inasmuch as the word lodgment appears in all the editions of Johnson with the e, though the other words are without it:—but the American lexicographer, instead of taking up and sanctioning this slight deviation from the practice of the day, chooses, in this instance, to run with the current. If the same course were pursued in this dictionary with regard to the words in question, it would but be in unison with its declared plan; but for the sake of experiment, the more correct, however less usual spelling, is for once adopted, (namely judgement, abridgement, acknowledgement.) in order to show that the public (who will doubtless continue to reject the hint) never take their fashion of spelling from a dictionary, but expect that a dictionary shall take its fashion of spelling from them.

4. PRINCIPLES OF ETYMOLOGY.

197. Etymology is a distribution of words according to their themes or roots, which themes are either the primary forms that branch out into the various inflections required in speech; or they are the primary meanings which the words bore in another or the same language, before they had migrated into a different dialect, or into new shades of meaning. In the former view, etymology belongs to grammar; in the latter, it is generally reckoned among the higher branches of philology. With regard to etymology in both these senses, all that is proposed at present is to account, under the former view, for some few deviations in this dictionary from the usual manner of distinguishing or specifying words, and to show the nature and method of the common inflections, which, because they are common, are not inserted in the dictionary:—and, under the latter view, to state how far the plan of the dictionary is consistent with any inquiries into the origin of words, in order that no more may be expected in this particular than its design can comprehend.

198. Nothing can be more unphilosophical than the attempt made by some writers, Harris, for instance, to explain the nature of the parts of speech by a reference to the nature of our thoughts. A thought is indivisible, but a sentence is made up of parts, which parts are therefore inexplicable by the nature of the thought expressed. It is possible to conceive a language with only two sorts of words; nay, in a state perfectly untaught, man has only his natural cries, the cry, like the thought or the feeling it is meant to signify, being in such case indivisible. Of artificial speech, the noun and the verb are the only essential parts; and the difference between these is merely conventional, a sign agreed upon for the distinction being annexed in some way to one of them. The noun signifies something known, or felt, or thought of, but it has not the power to signify it as a sentence; the verb has this power, because it has the sign by which it is agreed that this power shall be understood: thus, To hope is a verb because the prefix to implies its power to signify a sentence: hope is a noun, because it has no such sign: can is a verb, because the sense it bears as a verb is never expressed by a corresponding noun in the same manner that the sense of to hope is expressed by the noun hope. The differences among the other parts of speech are properly resolvable only in the same manner: small is an adjective, because it is never used but with a substantive: good, abstractedly, is not an adjective, but an adjective and a substantive, being sometimes used as the one, and sometimes as the other. The ordinary practice in dictionaries, is to exhibit two words in such cases, e. g. good, an adj. and good a subs.; a practice arising out of an erroneous notion of the real differences of the parts of speech. A brick which is fitted to be used indifferently, either at the corner or in the front of a rising edifice, should surely not be specified in the catalogue as a brick of two sorts, while it awaits the builder's hand to be turned to one purpose or the other: it is only when there is one form of brick for the corner position, and one for the front, that the things are in their nature different. So again, a verb which is sometimes active, and sometimes neuter, is not a distinct word in the two cases, if its meaning remains the same in both, with no other difference than more or less abstraction: since, if a difference like this is allowed to make two distinct words out of one, then all the different shades of meaning to which every word is liable, will, in every case, multiply it into so many distinct words. Indeed, it will sometimes happen that a secondary departs so widely from the primary meaning of a word, as to render it advisable to consider the two meanings as two words: for instance, court, a yard, or paved enclosure, and court, in the sense of solicitation, address. For, suppose it possible to trace the latter meaning up to the former, yet the two extremes of meaning are so different as to render the connection a matter of curiosity rather than of utility. On this principle, although a verb active and a verb neuter of the same form will not in general be exhibited as distinct words, yet when, as with the verb to become, the active sense is wholly different from the neuter, they will be exhibited as distinct words, however related by etymological ties. With still stronger reason will words be kept distinct which differ both in meaning and in etymology, and which would never have been confounded but from an accidental identity of form. With what propriety, for instance, can the pope's bull, and bull, the animal, be mingled as diverse meanings of the same word, when, on every ground that can be taken, they are evidently different words? And yet the same dictionaries that so carefully separate one and the same verb into two words, because it is capable of an active and a passive use, are continually mingling, after this fashion, words that never were related, and which have nothing in common but the accident of being written in the same way.

199. The orthography, etymology, syntax, and prosody of a language, being duly treated, form a grammar of that language. Without the formal undertaking of an English grammar, the first and last of these parts, orthography and prosody, have been considered in the previous pages as far as practical benefit seems attainable. As to the third, syntax, this, in our language, is so simple, that any development of its principles would but be the statement of such as belong to universal grammar; of which it would be quite out of place here to treat. It remains, then, in order to complete the practical objects of an English grammar, only to refer to the various changes or inflections of words which belong to etymology in the grammatical application of the term.

The ARTICLE a often takes the form an: see the rule for this in the dictionary under AN.

SUBSTANTIVES form their plural by adding s to the singular; as book, books: but when s would be incapable of distinct pronunciation, es, making another syllable, are added to form the plural; as church, church-es; lash, lash-es; fox, fox-es; kiss, kiss-es,—such syllable being pronounced iz: (151:) and nouns that end in y not preceded by a vowel, form their plural by changing y into ies; as fly, flies; fan'-cy, (fān'-cēy), fan'-cies, (fān'-cīz; 120.) All other modes of forming the plural are accounted irregular, that is to say, are unusual; which irregular modes are noted at the respective words in the dictionary.

The GENITIVE, or as otherwise called, POSSESSIVE case of substantives, is signified in English by 's, which is pronounced precisely like the plural s; as man, man's; men, men's; and like es when it occurs, as in Church's, fox's. But when harshness would follow the retention and pronunciation of the genitive s, it is usual to place only the apostrophe: thus, the plural genitive boys's is shortened into boys', churches's into churches', and even the genitive singular conscience's into conscience'.

ADJECTIVES being monosyllables, or dissyllables if accented on the last syllable, or accented on the first if the last syllable should end in y or le, form their comparative and superlative by r or er, st or est, the final y of those which so terminate being changed into i; as white, whiter, whitest; fair, fairer, fairest; polite, politer, politest; happy, happier, happiest; able, abler, ablest. Some monosyllabic adjectives have not a comparative and superlative of their own, but borrow those of some other word whose positive is obsolete; as bad, which takes worse and worst for its degrees of comparison. In general, those adjectives which form their degrees irregularly are noted at their places in the dictionary.

PRONOUNS not being liable to regular modes of inflection, have their respective inflections indicated in the dictionary.

VERBS form their second person singular of the present indicative by the addition of st or est to the first person; as I love, thou lovest; I read, thou readest; and their third person singular by the addition of s or es, or changing y into ies, precisely as nouns form their plural; as he loves, he reads, he fishes, he all'ies, he sullies, (sūl'īz;)—the other form of the third person, namely, in th, may be considered obsolete: and as to the remaining persons of the present tense, they have no variation from the first person singular:—of the past tense, the second person singular is formed by adding st or est to the first person; as I loved, thou lovedst; I felt, thou fellest; the other persons have no variation. In the subjunctive mood, the present tense (so called) has no variation throughout its persons, and the past tense (so called) is the same in form and variation as the past of the indicative; except the verb To be. Verbs which depart from these general rules are noted with their peculiar inflections in the dictionary: and, under the word SUBJUNCTIVE, a rule will be found for the use of this mood; as, under the word SHALL, some hints are furnished for the proper interchange of this word and WILL.

The PARTICIPLES of verbs are formed, the one by adding ing, the other d or ed in the infinitive; as forming and formed from To form. The omission of final e, as in loving, is no irregularity; nor must the doubling of a final consonant be accounted one, as in fitting, fitted, from To fit; except in such instances as travelling, travelled, from To travel; worshipping, worshipped, from To worship: see 194. The last are, however, irregularities of orthography rather than of etymology; and, being confined to a few words, chiefly those in e, will not be noticed in the dictionary. The Pæterit, or Past tense, is formed precisely as the past or passive participle; and verbs are accordingly deemed regular when this tense and the corresponding participle are formed by d or ed; as To love, I loved, Loved; To form, I formed, Formed. Irregular verbs, or those which deviate from these examples, are noted with their peculiar inflections in the dictionary.

Certain ADVERBS are liable to degrees of comparison under circumstances already noted in speaking of adjectives.

PREPOSITIONS, CONJUNCTIONS, INTERJECTIONS, are indeclinable.

200. The etymology of the English language, using the term in its higher application, can enter into the composition of a strictly English dictionary only to a certain degree; and the plan of the present dictionary having the limitation just noticed, the roots of words which have no existence in English are excluded from its pages. As far, however, as words can be traced to their originals, without the express quotation of words which are not English,²⁰⁰ so far will their etymologies be attempted to be shown. For this end, words will generally be classed so as to exhibit their affinities; the primary or original meaning of words will often be alluded to, though without example in English use; and words and meanings once existing, will be traced downwards, as far as necessary brevity may permit, to the present state of the language. Common prefixes, which enter into the meaning of multitudes of words, sometimes with diverse effect, will be carefully explained, and their various effect discriminated. The knowledge of these will often be a key by which to approach the original meaning of many words hitherto locked up from the mere English scholar. But common terminations, properly examined, promise to be still more useful in this way; and as these could not be introduced into the dictionary, it is proposed to conclude this development of "Principles," with the following Index, fitted, by the useful preliminary information it supplies, to come before the larger work.

indeed, the first part of it (one-thirtieth of the whole) was not published,—till more than half of mine was written, and a great part of it printed: or if, as I understand to be the case, a part of Mr. Richardson's dictionary had been long before the public in the pages of the Encyclopædia Metropolitana, yet I knew not of its existence, nor have I yet seen it there. It may be necessary to add that these "Principles" have been printed subsequently to a great part of the dictionary which follows them.

While I am on the subject of contemporary dictionaries, I may be excused for adverting to a statement I have seen in some prospectus, that, when Mr. Sheridan published his pronouncing dictionary, the booksellers were so jealous of its success, that they employed Walker to write his, expressly to start it in the market against Sheridan's. I have nothing to do with the truth or falsehood of this charge against booksellers long since deceased; but lest a similar motive should be alleged against my employers, I hereby declare, that when they proposed this work to me, there was no new dictionary, either in publication or in promise, which they could have a notion of opposing; and my answer to their proposal, accompanying a plan of the present dictionary, was dated as far back as Feb. 17, 1832: since which time I have been more or less actively employed in getting together the materials, or in arranging them.

²⁰⁰ I would not for a moment be understood to depreciate this part of lexicography, or deny its indispensable presence in an English dictionary, not meant, as this is, for common, general use. A dictionary having the objects of the present one, is necessarily limited in space and bulk, and two things are excluded from it which, in a dictionary of higher pretensions, are of primary concern: the one of these is alluded to above; the other is equally important, but impossible in a dictionary of moderate size,—quotations of authors to illustrate and justify the definitions. In precisely those particulars in which this dictionary is deficient, that of Mr. Charles Richardson, publishing at the same time with it, is remarkably copious. Of a work thus standing on other and higher ground, all rivalry on my part is of course out of the question; and I may be believed when I say, I cordially rejoice in the benefit our literature is likely to derive from a dictionary which, by its plan and extent, appears likely to leave all its predecessors far behind. One feature of the plan appears to agree with that which I have conceived and pursued,—I mean the classing of words which are of the same family. I know not how far the plans are coincident in this respect; but the similarity, whatever it may be, I solemnly declare to be quite accidental; I never saw Mr. Richardson's work,—

AN INDEX OF THE MORE IMPORTANT COMMON TERMINATIONS.

. For the preparation of this Index, I am indebted chiefly to my son LEOPOLD, my coadjutor through the whole work.

Words ending in a, are, with few exceptions, nouns substantive adopted from Greek, Latin, Italian, &c.; as comma, idea, era, sofa: or the plural number of nouns terminating in um or us in the singular; as errata, genera, which are the plurals of erratum and genus. As a distinction from the names of the metals in um, (see -um.) some chemists adopt a for the characteristic termination of the names of the earths and alkalis: thus instead of barytes, strontites, alumine, potass, &c., they say baryta, strontia, alumina, potassa; and, correspondently, silica, glucina, soda, ammonia, &c. But other names of earths, as lime, zircon, &c., have not yet been assimilated to these; nor are all chemists agreed in the assimilation of the rest.

-ac, -acy, see -ic, and -cy.

-act, are relations of actus, the participle of the Latin verb ago, to act, to perform; as to react, to transact, exact, (adj.)

-ad, } are frequently titles of heroic or mock heroic poems; shortened from, or on the

-id, }

Words ending in

- pattern of, words shortened from Greek genitives; as Iliad, Æneid, Baviad:—sometimes they are names of number; as myriad, chiliad; sometimes, names of spaces of time; as hebdomad, olympiad.
- ade, are very often nouns borrowed or imitated from the continental languages; as barricade, escalade, colonnade, gasconade, masquerade.
- ado, are chiefly adopted Italian words, as barricado, bravado, which frequently drop into the French form exemplified above.
- as, are Latin nouns plural often without a singular, which singular would terminate in a; as esuvia, acidula, stria; or they are Latin nouns in the genitive case, that is, including the force of the preposition of; as aqua vita, literally, the water of life.
- age, are chiefly nouns of English formation, having a collective or abstract meaning; as herbage, pillage, vassalage, brokerage, wharfage: they sometimes signify money paid for something: e. g. for brokerage or wharfage: but this is generally a secondary, not the primary meaning. Note, that from among words of this termination, those in -gage, and also those in -alla-ge, must be distinguished: see -gage, and -alla-ge.
- agogue, are nouns signifying he or that which leads, drives, or brings something, being related to the Greek ἀγωγός, (agogos), a leader; as demagogue, plymagogue, synagogue.
- al, are very frequently adjectives shortened from Latin words in alis; as regal, legal, frugal, martial: those in -cal, however, are more frequently derived from Latin words in cus than calis; (see -cal.) Sometimes they are words which originally terminated in all; as to inthral, to miscal, and which retain in pronunciation the broad sound of the a.
- algy, are nouns related to the Greek word ἄλγος, (algos), pain; as cardialgy, cephalgy.
- ality, see -lity, and -ity.
- allage, are nouns compounded with the Greek word ἀλλαγή, (al'-la-ge), change or transposition; as enallage, (e not mute,) hypallage.
- alty, are sometimes abstract names of offices, formed by the addition of alty to the common name; as from mayor, mayoralty.
- ana, are arbitrary compounds with authors' names; as Walpoliana, Johnsoniana, which mean, sayings, anecdotes, and other things of or relating to Walpole, &c.
- any, are often abstract nouns; as chapellany, castellany, villany, botany.
- ance, } are most frequently abstract nouns from Latin words in -antia and -entia; as
- ence, } elegance, abstinence; or that follow the pattern of nouns so derived; as disturbance, dependence. Those in -ance often come to us through the French language.
- ane, are chiefly adjectives derived from Latin adjectives in anus or anis; as profane, insane.
- anthropy, are nouns compounded with the Greek word ἄνθρωπος, (anthropos), man; as misanthropy, philanthropy.
- ant, are generally adjectives from Latin participial adjectives in ans; as coruscant, vagrant.
- ar, } are frequently adjectives shortened from Latin adjectives in aris; as familiar,
- ary, } auxiliary, perpendicular, military. Words of the latter termination are commonly from Latin adjectives in arius, as mercenary; which are very often substantives as well as adjectives.
- arch, } are nouns compounded with or allied to the Greek word ἀρχή, (ar'-che), supremacy, government; as monarchy, a monarch, a tetrarch.
- archy, } are frequently nouns of common English formation, designating persons from
- ard, } their character, quality, or condition; as niggard, dotard, wizard.
- arithm, are modern compounds with the Greek noun ἀριθμός, (arithmos), number; as logarithm. Algorithm or algorism is, however, originally Arabic, and assimilated probably through ignorance.
- asm, are always nouns substantive, and are generally contracted from Greek nouns in ασμα, (asma); as miasm, pleonasm, phantasm. Some of these have their Greek plural; as miasmata. See -zm.
- aster, are nouns of diminution or depreciation, as postaster; often formed spontaneously in imitation of the Italian idiom; as grammaticaster, lunilaster, &c.
- ate, in chemistry, are names of salts containing more than one degree of oxygen, as sulphate, phosphate; those which contain but one degree having names terminating in -ite, as sulphite, phosphite. In common language, they are very frequently verbs; as to initiate, to deliberate, to confederate; or adjectives agreeing with these, as initiate, &c., which sort of adjectives are now often replaced by the participial forms, as initiated, confederated, sometimes even where there is no verb to warrant the participial form: thus, situated has almost universally but improperly taken place of situate. In many instances, they are names of an office or dignity; as electorate, palatinate, pontificate.
- bark, are allied to the French word bargue, a vessel; as to embark, to disembark.

Words ending in

- base, are allied to the Latin word basis, the lowest part or foundation; as to abase, to debase.
- bate, are sometimes relations of the French verb battre, to beat; as to abate, to debate: the sense is generally figurative.
- bel, are related, sometimes through the French, to the Latin verb bello, to make war; as to rebel, to rebel; a rebel.
- bility, see lower, next to -ble.
- bious, are adjectives signifying manner of living, allied to the Greek word βίος, (bios,) life; as amphibious.
- bite, are, in some few instances, also relations of the Greek word βίος; as the noun-substantive a cenobite; but more frequently they are English compounds; as to backbite.
- ble, are very frequently adopted from the French, whether substantives or adjectives; as trouble, capable, sensible: many, however, are direct from Latin words in abilis and ibilis, as mutable, flexible.
- bility, are substantives allied to corresponding adjectives of the previous class, either from Latin substantives in bilis, as ability, nobility; or formed in English from the adjective without authority from Latin; as flexibility, irascibility.
- bly, are generally adverbs from adjectives in -ble; as ably, flexibly.
- bolons, } are allied, those of the former termination as adjectives, those of the latter as substantives, to the Greek word βίλος, (bolos,) a cast or throw; as amphibolous, amphiboly.
- borough, } are names of towns or boroughs, the three terminations having the same meaning; as Queenborough, Edinburgh, Newbury.
- burgh, }
- bury, }
- bourn, }
- born, }
- burn, }
- bote, are old English words denoting supply or material yielded for the needful repairs of something, or other use; as hedge-bote, plough-bote.
- bre, see -re.
- burse, are allied to the French word bourse, a purse; as to disburse, to reimburse.
- by, when names of places, are compounds with the Saxon word by, a village or street; as Grimsbury, Weatherby.
- cal, are adjectives formed on the pattern of other adjectives in -al, from Latin adjectives in cus; as magical, comical; or they follow the patterns of such English adjectives, as angelical, alphabetical: and note, that most of these adjectives are liable to be contracted; as magio, comic, angelic, alphabetical: see -ic.
- caster, } are names of places compounded with the Saxon word cester or chester, a city; as Doncaster, Cirencester, Manchester.
- cester, }
- cheater, }
- cease, are relations of the Latin verb cedo, to yield, to go, or depart; of its kindred verb cesso, to leave off, give up, or cease; and of the noun derived from the latter, cessio, a going forth, a yielding or giving up; as to decess; to proceed, to exceed; to accede, to intercede; a recess, a process; a procession, an intercession.
- cede, }
- cerle, }
- cess, }
- cession, }
- ceive, are words allied to the Latin word capio either in its literal sense, to take, or its consequential sense, to take into the mind; those in -ceive come to us through the French: as to receive, to perceive, to deceive, (i. e. to catch up, to entrap;)
- cept, } to intercept; reception, perception, deception; recipient.
- ception, }
- cipient, }
- cele, are nouns related to the Greek noun κῆλη, (ke-le or ce-le,) a tumor; as hydrocele, bronchocele: in which, and in other compounds of this word, the final e is mute when they are pronounced as English words, contrary to the usual practice with words adopted from Greek or Latin: see Prin. 101.
- cern, are relations of the Latin verb cerno, to sift, separate, or distinguish; as to discern, to discern.
- chord, are names of musical instruments, as pentachord, harpsichord: see -cord.
- chronous, } are relations of the Greek χρόνος, (chronos,) time; as synchronous, (adj.) anachronism, (subs.)
- chronism, }
- chymy, are related to the Greek word χῆμα, (chyma,) that which is poured out, from χύνω, (chyo,) to pour out liquids; as alchemy, alchemist. The modern orthography, chemist, rejects this derivation, and assumes the word to be originally Arabic.
- chymist, }
- cide, are words related either to cado or to cædo, Latin verbs quite distinct from each other, the former signifying to fall, the latter, to cut or slay. Thus from the former we have stillicide, a falling of drops, to coincide, to fall in with, &c., and from the latter, lapicide, a stone cutter, homicide, a man slayer, &c.
- cident, are nouns substantive or adjective related to the former of the two Latin verbs mentioned above, generally in its figurative sense of to befall or happen; as incident, coincident, accident, accident, &c.

Words ending in
cision,

are nouns related to the latter of the two Latin verbs mentioned under -cide; as excision, incision, decision, (i. e. a cutting short,) precision, (i. e. a paring or cutting close or exactly.) Adjectives in -cise are relations of the same word, as precise, concise.

-cinct,

are relations of cinctus, the participle of the Latin verb cingo, to gird up, and hence to shorten, and to surround; as succinct, (adj.) precinct, (subs.)

-cite,

are relations of Latin verbs compounded with cito, to call by name, to stir up, to produce as a witness; as to accite, to incite, to recite.

-claim,

are relations of the Latin verb clamo, to cry or call upon, to obtest: they are generally derived from the French; as to proclaim, to exclaim, to disclaim, to reclaim: it is only in old authors that any of these are substantives; as an acclaim.

-cle,

are mostly substantives from Latin words in culum through the French, or from words formed in French on the pattern of such substantives; as receptacle, spectacle, circle, obstacle, vehicle: they are frequently diminutives; as cornicle, funicle, ventricle, pinnacle.

-cline,

are relations of the Latin verb clino, to bend, to lean in some direction; as to incline, to recline, to decline.

-close,

-clude,

-close,

are relations of the Latin verbs claudio or cludo, to shut or enclose, those in -close coming to us through the French; as to unclos, to disclos; to exclud, to preclud; occlud, reclud.

-coct,

are relations of coctus, the participle of the Latin verb coquo, to cook, to prepare by heat; as to decoct, to concoct.

-comb,

are frequently names of places situate between hills, as Encomb, Wycomb; and hence honey-comb, as having hollows or cells. But many of these are compounds of comb, the instrument for dividing hair, or of a crest resembling this instrument; as a currycomb, a cock'scomb.

-cope,

are compounds of the Greek noun κοπή, (co-pe,) a cut or cutting off; as synco-pe, apoco-pe.

-cord,

are words related originally to chorda, a Greco-Latin word signifying a musical string; as accord, discord. But some of these are said to have their origin from cor, the heart; as concord, record.

-corn,

if not English compounds, as breadcorn, peppercorn, are related to the Latin noun cornu, a horn; as unicorn, capricorn.

-cosm,

are relations of the Greek noun κόσμος, (cosmos,) the world; as microcosm.

-course,

-see cur.

-cracy,

are abstract nouns signifying government, related to the Greek word κρατία, (cratio,) to rule; as theocracy, democracy; hence the adjectives democratical or democratic, &c.

-cre,

see -re.

-crease,

are verbs from the Latin verb creasco, to grow, derived through the French; as to increase, to decrease.

-crete,

are adjectives from the Latin cretus, the participle of creasco; (see above); as concrete, growing with; discrete, growing or being apart or distinct.

-cumb,

are relations of the Latin verb cumbo, to lie down, to sink, to yield; as to accumb, to succumb.

-cur,

-current,

-course,

are relations of the Latin verb curro, to run, the sense being generally figurative; as to occur, to concur, to recur; those in ent are nouns adj. or subs., as current, occurent; those in course are generally substantives, derived through the French; as intercourse, concourse, discourse.

-cuss,

are relations of quassus, written cussus in compounds, the participle of the Latin verb quat, to shake; as to percuss, to excuss, to discuss.

-cy,

are almost always substantives, many of them formed by changing tia or ria of a Latin word into -cy; as abbacy, fallacy; or by the addition of -cy after the omission of t or te in an English noun substantive or adjective, which gives in general the correspondent abstract noun; as from the nouns and adjectives primate, supreme, infant, cogent, we form primacy, supremacy, infancy, and cogency.

-dam,

are substantives related to the French word dame, a lady, or mother; as beldam, grandam.

-dean,

-den,

are names of places compounded with the Saxon word dean or den, a valley or hollow; as Rottingdean, Cumden.

-deem,

are compounds of the English verb to deem, as addeem, misdeem; except redeem, which is from the Latin verb redimo.

-demic,

are adjectives related to the Greek word δῆμος, (demos,) a people or community; as epidemic, endemic. Academic is from a proper name.

-dense,

are relations of densus, thick, from the Latin adjective densus; as to condense.

-dict,

are relations of dictus, the participle of the Latin verb dico, to say; as to predict, to interdict; an edict.

Words ending in

- dom, are English nouns of Saxon parentage signifying power or dominion; as earldom, birthdom. We must except seldom and random.
- don, see -ton.
- dote, } are relations of the Greek word δοτον, (doton,) something given; as antidote,
-dotal, } (subs.) antidotal, (adj.)
- dox, } are relations of the Greek word δοξα, (doxa,) opinion; as orthodox, (adj.)
-doxy, } orthodoxy, (subs.)
- duce, } are relations of the Latin verb duco, to lead; as to abduce, to reduce, to conduce;
-duct, } to deduct, to conduct; hence, deduction, introduction.
- e, not mute, are adopted classical words; as hyperbo-le, simi-le: with but very few exceptions, such as extem-pore, puis-ne, &c., they are purely Greek.
- ean, are mostly adjectives from Greek adjectives, or formed on the pattern of such adjectives, in αιος or αιος, (aios, eios,) whose Latin form is æus or æus. We take the last of these forms, and change us into an; as Atlantæan, Europæan. Such of these as come to us from the Latin language, without reference to a Greek original, have the penultimate short; as Cerulæan, Herculæan: see Prin. 86. Should a word of this description be used substantively for the name of a place, the Greek or the Latin neuter form of the termination, namely αιον, æum, or æum, is used: thus, Athenæion, Athenæum, or Athenæum.
- ecian, see -ocese.
- ed, are regular past or passive participles of verbs, as loved, declared, instructed; or adjectives, as wicked, naked.
- ee, are correlatives of nouns in -or, used chiefly in law; as appellee, assigner, mortgagee. Some are of more general use and signification, as jubilee, pedigree, which do not, as the others, accent the last syllable.
- eer, see -ier.
- em, are frequently formed from classical words in -ema, as problem, theorem.
- en, are very frequently active verbs formed from adjectives and substantives by the addition of en; as to deaden, to madden, to lengthen, to weaken: or they are participles passive of verbs which refuse the regular form in ed; as trodden, beaten, driven, frozen: or they are adjectives formed from substantives to express the material of which a thing is made; as leadén, woodén, beecheén, hempeén.
- ence, see -ance.
- ene, are adjectives from Latin adjectives in enus; as serene, terrene.
- ennial, are adjectives of time related to the Latin word annus, a year; as perennial.
- ent, are frequently adjectives from Latin participial adjectives in ens, (the participle, in some of the instances, of esse, to be,) as present, absent; fervent.
- er, are sometimes adjectives in the comparative degree; as greater, longer: much more frequently, they are substantives formed from verbs, and signifying the doer of the action included in the meaning of the verb; as, from to do, to live, to love, to have, we get the nouns, a doer, a liver, a lover, a haver: some of these indifferently denote a person or a thing; as a ruler, a poker, a waiter. When formed from nouns, the added termination is sometimes ster instead of er; as a webster, (a weaver,) a roadster. In many instances, and often without much or any reason for the difference, the termination or is preferred to the common English termination in er; as instructor, collector; which is an imitation of the Latin idiom, and indispensable in the adoption of an express Latin word; as professor, oppressor. So instructor, in the Latin sense of one who makes something ready, is properly spelled with or. Hence the Latin model is often preferred to indicate a specific application of the general term: e. g. a sailer is he or that which sails, but a sailor is a seaman; a director is one who directs generally, but a director is a manager of a trading company.
- es, pronounced in a distinct syllable, if not English plurals, as faces, boxes, churches, are classical nouns, either of the singular number, as sorites, carries; or only used in the plural, as ma'nes, antipodes; or the plurals of nouns terminating in is in the singular, as hypoth'eses, em'phases; or being both singular and plural, as spe'cies, ser'ies. The old adverb cer'-tes, which our ancestors borrowed from the French, does not class with these words.
- ess, are often nouns feminine, distinguished by this termination from correspondent nouns masculine; as shepherdess, giantess, negress, lioness. In some instances the feminine termination, though used, is not indispensable; as authoress.
- cat, are frequently adjectives in the superlative degree; as greatest, longest.
- et, is often a diminutive, as coronet, floweret, baronet: see also -let and -ret.
- ey, if names of places, are generally compounds of the Saxon word ey or ig, an isle; as Ramsey, Thorney.
- face, are related, along with the English word face, to the Latin facies of the same meaning; as preface, a surface; to deface, to efface.
- faction, see -fect, &c., lower.

Words ending in

- fare, are Saxon words which include the notion of a going or passage, or that which goes; as thoroughfare, welfare, fieldfare.
- fect, } are relations of the Latin verb facio, to make or do; as to effect, to affect; an effect, a prefect; to profit; a benefit; efficient; an edifice, an office. Words ending in section or faction are also relations of these; and also those ending in seit, as counterfeit; but these come to us through the French faire.
- ficent, } are relations of the Latin verb fero, to bear or carry; as to transfer, to confer, to profess, to dis-fer; pestiferous, somniferous.
- ficie, } see -find.
- fend, } are relations of the Latin verb fido, to trust; as to confide, to diffide; confident, diffident.
- fence, } are relations of the Latin verb fendo, to strike, the meaning being very often figurative; as to offend, to defend, (i. e. to strike or ward off;) an offence, a defence.
- fer, } are relations of the Latin verb fero, to bear or carry; as to transfer, to confer, to profess, to dis-fer; pestiferous, somniferous.
- ferous, } see -find.
- fid, } are relations of the Latin verb fido, to trust; as to confide, to diffide; confident, diffident.
- fide, } are relations of the Latin verb fido, to trust; as to confide, to diffide; confident, diffident.
- fident, } are relations of the Latin verb fido, to trust; as to confide, to diffide; confident, diffident.
- find, } are relations of the Latin verb fido, to trust; as to confide, to diffide; confident, diffident.
- fine, } are relations of the Latin verb fido, to trust; as to confide, to diffide; confident, diffident.
- firm, } are relations of the Latin word finis, a limit; as a confine; to define; or of the French word fin, the opposite to coarse; as to refine; superfine.
- flect, } are relations of the Latin verb flecto, to bend; as to inflect, to reflect. The derivatives of these, in ion, may be spelled either flexion or flection.
- fleet, } when names of places, are compounds of the Saxon word fleot or fleet, an inlet for water; as Wainfleet, Northfleet.
- flict, } are relations of flictus, the participle of the Latin verb figo, to beat or dash; as a conflict; to inflict, to afflict.
- fluent, } are relations of the Latin verb fluo, to flow; as influent, affluent; influx, confluent. Those in fluus, as mellifluus, are also relations.
- flux, } are compounds of the Saxon word fold, a doubling: they are frequently adverbs; as twofold, manifold, &c. Sometimes the affix has a more literal meaning; as to infold; blindfold. The word scaffold is no relation of these.
- fold, } are relations of the Latin verb folia, a leaf; as centifolious, asperifolious.
- folious, } are English compounds; as gentlefolk, kinsfolk.
- folk, } when names of places, are compounds of the Saxon word ford, a place where a stream may be waded; as Oxford, Chelmsford.
- ford, } are Latin or English compounds of form or forma; as uniform, ensiform; to transform, to conform, to inform.
- form, } are relations of the Latin word fortis, strong; as effort, comfort.
- fort, } are relations of the Latin verb frango, to break, which in compounds is fringo, and whose participle is fractus; as to infringe; to infract, to refract.
- fringe, } are related to the Latin word frons, the forehead or front; as to confront, to affront.
- fract, } are relations of the Latin verb fugio, to fly from, to put to flight; as refuge, subterfuge, vermisfuge, centrifugal.
- front, } are adjectives implying plenitude, generally formed from substantives by adding the termination; as peaceful, slothful, artful.
- fuge, } are relations of fusus, the participle of the Latin verb fundo, to pour out; as to effuse, to infuse; infusive, effusive; to confuse. To confound is related to these, but comes to us through the French.
- fugal, } when the y is pronounced long, are relations of the Latin verb fito, to become, to make; as to deify, to satisfy, to liquefy.
- ful, } are generally relations of the French verb gager, to take or give a pledge; as to engage, to mortgage.
- gage, } are relations of the Greek verb γαμία, (gameo,) to marry; as bigamy, polygamy; a bigamist.
- gamy, } are relations of the Greek noun -γῆ, (gē,) the earth; as perigæum, perigee:—
- gamist, } the Greek form, perigæon, sometimes occurs.
- geum, } are relations of the Greek verb γίνομαι, (ginomai,) to beget, or of its kindred noun, γένος (in Latin genus) and γενή, (go-ne), an offspring, race, birth, or production; as to regenerate, degenerate, (adj.): oxygen, hydrogen; progeny, homogeneity; cosmogony, theogony.
- gee, } are relations of the Latin verb gero, which in the preterit sense is gessi, and signifies to bear, carry, conduct, or carry on; as belligerent, (adj.): to egest, to ingest, to suggest, (in which the sense is figurative,) to digest.
- generate, } are frequently nouns substantive of abstract meaning, having verbs or concrete nouns in correlation to them; thus sight, in relation to fly; tight, in relation to tie; and sight, in relation to see.
- gen, } are relations of the Greek verb γλύφω, (glypho,) to hollow out, carve, or engrave; as an anaglyph, a hieroglyph.
- geny, } are abbreviations from Greek nouns in agma, egma, &c., as diaphragm, phlegm, paradigm. In these abbreviations g is silent: see 157.
- gony, } are abbreviations from Greek nouns in agma, egma, &c., as diaphragm, phlegm, paradigm. In these abbreviations g is silent: see 157.
- gerent, } are abbreviations from Greek nouns in agma, egma, &c., as diaphragm, phlegm, paradigm. In these abbreviations g is silent: see 157.
- gest, } are abbreviations from Greek nouns in agma, egma, &c., as diaphragm, phlegm, paradigm. In these abbreviations g is silent: see 157.
- ght, } are frequently nouns substantive of abstract meaning, having verbs or concrete nouns in correlation to them; thus sight, in relation to fly; tight, in relation to tie; and sight, in relation to see.
- glyph, } are relations of the Greek verb γλύφω, (glypho,) to hollow out, carve, or engrave; as an anaglyph, a hieroglyph.
- gm, } are abbreviations from Greek nouns in agma, egma, &c., as diaphragm, phlegm, paradigm. In these abbreviations g is silent: see 157.

Words ending in

- gnostic, } are relations of γνῶσις and γνῶμη, (gnosticos and gnome,) which come from the Greek verb γινώσκω, (ginosco,) to know; as diagnostic, prognostic; physiognomy.
- gnomy, }
- gogue, } see -agogue.
- gon, } are relations of the Greek noun γωνία, (gonia,) an angle; as a pentagon, an octagon, a polygon; diagonal, octagonal.
- gonal, }
- gony, } see -generate.
- grade, } are relations of the Latin verb gradior, which in the participle is gressus, to go, to march along; as retrograde; retrograde (adj.); egress, regress, progress.
- gress, }
- graphy, } are relations of the Greek verb γράφω, (grapho,) to write, and its kindred noun γράμμα, (gramma,) something written; as biography, historiography; epigram, anagram.
- gram, }
- grave, } are compounds of a Teutonic word signifying a count; as landgrave, margrave.
- gre, } see -re.
- habit, } are relations of the Latin verb habito, to dwell; as to inhabit.
- ham, } are names of places, signifying a house, home, or village; as Petersham, Tottenham.
- hedron, } are names of mathematical figures, related to the Greek noun ἡδρα, (hedra,) a seat, base, or side; as polyhedron, chiliahedron.
- helion, } are astronomical terms, related to the Greek noun ἥλιος, (helios,) the sun; as parhelion, ophelion.
- herd, } are English compounds; as bearherd, shepherd.
- here, } are relations of the Latin verb hæreo, to stick to; as to adhere, to cohere; adhesion.
- hesion, }
- hold, } are English compounds; as to withhold, to uphold; a freehold, a household: in to behold the sense is figurative, implying to hold or reach with the eye.
- hood, } are nouns of Saxon parentage signifying a state or condition in the abstract; as boyhood, neighbourhood, widowhood, knighthood. Hence, derivatively, the persons existing in some state; as the priesthood, the sisterhood.
- hurst, } are Saxon names of places originally implying a wood or grove; as Penshurst, Chislehurst.
- i, } are generally classical plurals, of which the singulars (should there be any) terminate in us, er, or ir; as literati, triumviri; or they are Italian plurals from nouns in o or e, as banditti, conversazioni. In a few instances they are nouns singular imported from the East; as cadi, mufti.
- ian, } are frequently nouns, substantive or adjective, denoting office, profession, or character; as magician, historian, guardian, ruffian; elysian, tertian.
- ical, } are nouns adjective or substantive allied to correspondent nouns in ius, or icus, in Greek or Latin, or formed on the pattern of such nouns; as polemical, heroical, classical; polemic, heroic, classic; polemics, optics, mathematics. These in ics are nouns plural, applied respectively to an art or science, under the plural notion of things exercised, pursued, ascertained, or known by the methods peculiar to the art or science. In chemistry, the termination ic has a special and characteristic import; it occurs only in adjectives by which the different acids are discriminated; as nitric acid, sulphuric acid: these are distinguished from adjectives in ous, (as, nitrous acid, sulphurous acid;) by signifying the larger dose of oxygen which the former compounds contain, as compared with the latter compounds.
- id, } are mostly nouns adjective from correspondent Latin adjectives in idus; as sordid, turgid, liquid. See -ad.
- ide, } in chemistry, are names of compounds possessing no sensible properties of acids, and which are supporters of combustion; being distinguished, in this latter respect, from compound combustible substances whose names terminate in ret; (see -ret;) as oxide, chloride, iodide. The original spelling of the first of these was properly oxyd or oxyde. But, since the discovery of other supporters of combustion than oxygen alone, it properly conforms to the common termination.
- ier, } accented, or originally accented on the last syllable, are nouns common, generally denoting men from their occupations or employment, and borrowed from French or Italian words in ier, iere, aire, &c., as financier, grenadier, cavalier, gondolier; mountaineer, volunteer, musqueteer, muletteer; or they are words formed on the pattern of such nouns; as pamphleteer, auctioneer, garreteer. Some of the nouns, originally accented on the last syllable, have assumed a pronunciation more consonant to the genius of our language; as courier, premier.
- cer, }
- ile, } the accent not being on the last syllable, are almost always adjectives from correspondent Latin adjectives in ilis; as agile, gracile, fragile; gentile, dûle.
- im, } in one or two instances, are Hebrew plurals; as cherubim, seraphim, also written cherubin and seraphin.
- ine, } are sometimes adjectives from correspondent Latin adjectives in inus; as féline, femine. In heroine, the termination is characteristic of gender, like ess and

Words ending in

ix; but there is no other word to class with it. Marine, routine, machine, &c., are adoptions from the French, and have the accent on the last syllable, with the French sound of i: see Prin. 104. The names of the elementary chemical bodies, chlorine and iodine, originally ranking with these, have thrown their accents back to the penultimate and antepenultimate, according to the natural tendencies of our language; and the termination might be considered characteristic of elementary bodies which are acidifying supporters of combustion, if the name of the remaining body of this kind, viz., oxygen, had not previously taken its place, as to the form of its name, with hydrogen and nitrogen. Chlorine and iodine are their proper pronunciation,—as agreeing in some degree with their original sounds,—as being quite suitable to our own idiom, (Prin. 105.)—and as furnishing the clearest audible difference from ide, the characteristic termination in chloride and iodide.

-ing, are, for the most part, present participles, or words originally of that class and used substantively or adjectively; as being, writing, loving, wedding. In names of places, the termination ing signifies a meadow or pasture; as Knottling, Climping: but words terminating in ing must generally be distinguished: see -ling.

-is, are frequently Greek or Latin nouns; as crisis, emphasis, antithesis. These form their plural in es.

-ise, -ize, } are very frequently verbs, those in -ize almost without exception, as to advertise, to civilize. They often correspond to Greek verbs in ίζω, (izo), as to characterize: but verbs are formed in English almost spontaneously on the same model.

-ish, are adjectives formed for the most part spontaneously by the addition of the termination to other adjectives, or to substantives, by which a diminished force is given to the former, and an adjective import to the latter; as from black, blackish; from sweet, sweetish;—also from a wag, waggish; from a fool, foolish. The termination is likewise a characteristic of adjectives denoting nation or country; as Irish, English, Danish, &c.

-ism, are abstract substantives frequently formed spontaneously on the model of those in asm, &c., (see -sm.) as Judaism, heathenism, whiggism; sometimes they are names indicating an idiom in speech; as a Gallicism, a Scotticism.

-ist, are frequently nouns designating men from their occupations, pursuits, or principles; as a deist, a theorist, a chemist.

-ite, in chemistry, are names of salts containing only one degree of oxygen, as sulphite, phosphite: (compare -ate.) Much more frequently they are names of minerals; as selenite, nephelite, steatite; but particularly those in ite: (see -lite.) In language on ordinary subjects, they are often names formed spontaneously in imitation of the Gentile and other collective names in scripture; as a bedlamite, a Jacobite, a Foxite. Otherwise, they are nouns adjective or substantive, formed from correspondent Latin nouns in itus; as appetite, exquisite.

ity, with the accent on the previous syllable, are nouns substantive, commonly formed from Latin nouns in itas; as ability, serenity, atrophy, fluidity, calamity.

-ix, are often nouns feminine distinguished by this termination from correspondent nouns masculine; as administratrix, testatrix.

-jacent, -ject, } are relations of the Latin verb jacio, to cast; whose participle is jactus, written jectus in compounds; as adjacent, circumjacent; (adjectives;) object, object.

-join, -joint, } are relations of the Latin verb jungo, to join, through the French joindre; as to adjoin, to disjoin; disjoint, conjoint.

-journal, are related to the French noun journée, a day; as to adjourn, (to put off the day or time,) to adjourn, (to stay during the day, or days.)

-jure, are relations of the Latin verb juro, to swear; as to adjure, to perjure.

-kin, are frequently nouns diminutive; as manikin, lambkin.

-kind, are English compounds, as mankind, womankind, in which the affix has the sense of genus; and unkind, in which it has the sense of loving or complacent.

-land, are English compounds; as headland, woodland, except garland, and perhaps a few others.

-lany, see -any.

-lapse, are relations of lapsus, the participle of the Latin verb labor, to slide or fall down; as, to ilapse, to collapse.

-lar, are generally adjectives from correspondent Latin adjectives in arius or aris, or formed on the pattern of such adjectives; as titular, auxiliary, popular. Similar comes to us through the French.

-lateral, are adjectives implying side or sided, from the Latin adjective lateralis; as equilateral, quadrilateral, collateral; in which last word the sense is figurative.

-latry, -later, } are, in several instances, nouns related to the Greek word λατρεία, (latreia), service or worship; as idolatry, demonolatry; idolater.

Words ending in

- lay are often English compounds, with the verb to lay, as to mislay, to overlay; or relations of the old French word lai, a complaint, a poem; as roundelay. In names of places this termination signifies a meadow or field: see -ley.
- lease, are relations of the French verb laisser, to leave, in its senses to let have, to let free; as to release.
- lect,
-lection,
-league,
-legation,
-lege,
-ligation,
-lepis,
-lepsy,
-lemma,
-less, } are relations in some instances of one, in some instances of another of three Latin verbs, which, from their similarity of form, are often confounded in the compounds; viz. lêgo, (often spelled figo in compounds,) to gather, or to read; figo, to bind; and lêgo, to send; as to collect, a collect, a collection; to select, select, a selection; a colleague; (this comes to us through the French;) an ablegation; a college; an obligation.
- lepsy,
-lepsy,
-lemma,
-less, } are nouns related to the Greek verb λήψωμαι, (lepsomai), to take or seize; as metalepsy, prolepsis; epilepsy; analemma. The word ellipsis is no relation of these, but is from the Greek verb λείπω, (leipo), to leave or relinquish.
- let,
-ley,
-leigh, } are Saxon adjectives having a privative meaning, or adjectives formed spontaneously on the model of such; as witless, godless, needless, pennyless.
- let,
-ley,
-leigh, } are often nouns diminutive; as ringlet, croquet.
- like,
-ly, } if names of places, imply a meadow; or irrigated ground; as Henley, Dudley, Chudleigh. The terminations -lea, -lay, -ly, in names of places, have the same meaning.
- like,
-ly, } are Saxon adjectives, or adjectives formed spontaneously on the model of such, and signifying resemblance in quality; as godlike, manlike, saintlike; godly, manly, sainly. Or they are adverbs formed by adding the latter form of the termination to adjectives; as warmly, coldly, happily, wondrously.
- linear,
-lineal,
-ling, } are adjectives related to the Latin adjective or substantive linearis, or linea, (a line), as rectilinear, curvilinear; unlinear. The last has only a figurative sense.
- lite, are very frequently diminutives; as seedling, lordling, darling; and these are often formed spontaneously, as Greek'ing, fopling.
- lity, in mineralogy, are names related to the Greek noun λίθος, (lithos), a stone; as chrysolite, sodalite, cryolite. Mineralogists, inattentive to the meaning of this termination, are now in the habit of adding only ite in the formation of new names. Indeed, nothing can be more arbitrary or unfixed by unity of principle or purpose than the greater part of the names in mineralogy; and, except a few in common use, they do but encumber the pages of a dictionary. What are we to think of gibbsite, a mineral found in Webster's dictionary, and in the grounds of one 'Square Gibbs, of Massachusetts?
- lity, with the accent on the previous syllable, are abstract nouns; as principality, fidelity, ability, frivolity, credulity.
- lle, are all French words; as belle, bagatelle, canaille, quadrille.
- logue,
-logy,
-loquy,
-locution, } are nouns related to the Greek noun λόγος, (logos), a word, speech, or discourse; as a dialogue, a monologue, an epilogue; apology, tautology, geology.
- loquy,
-locution, } are nouns related to the Latin verb loquor, to speak, whose participle is locutus, which verb is from the Greek noun λόγος; as a soliloquy; obloquy, (bad or reproachful language;) a prolocution; elocution.
- lorn, are adjectives, compounded with the participle of a Saxon verb, signifying to forsake; as forlorn, lovelorn.
- low,
-lude,
-lusion,
-lunar, } if names of places, imply a mound or bank; as Hounslow, Marlow.
- lusion,
-lunar, } are relations of the Latin verb ludo, to play, whose preterit is lusi; as to delude, to elude, to prelude; a prelude; delusion, collusion.
- lunar, are relations of the Latin adjective lunaris, pertaining to the moon; as sublunar, interlunar.
- lysis, are nouns related to the Greek noun λύσις, (lysis), a loosening, weakening, or disengaging; as paralysis, analysis.
- machy, are nouns allied to the Greek noun μάχη, (ma-che), a fight, a conflict; as nau-machy, logomachy.
- mancy, are nouns allied to the Greek noun μαντεία, (manteia), prophecy, divination; as necromancy, chiromancy.
- mand,
-mend,
-mas,
-mathy, } are verbs related to the Latin verb mando, to intrust, to bid; as to demand, to remand; to commend.
- mas,
-mathy, } are Saxon compounds, signifying a holiday; as Candlemas, Michaelmas.
- member, are nouns related to the Greek noun μάθησις, (mathe-sis), knowledge, learning; as polymathy.
- member, are either English compounds, as to dismember; or more commonly relations of the verb meminiscor, to call to mind; derived through Norman French; as to remember.
- men, are words adopted from the classical languages; as acumen, abdomen, amen; to be of course distinguished from such English words as freemen, workmen.

Words ending in

- ment, are nouns formed by the addition of the termination to verbs, &c.; as from to engage, engagement; to manage, management. But if the accent is on the last syllable, the word does not class with these; e. g. to cement.
- merce, are words related to the Latin noun merx, (which in the genitive is mercis,) merchandize, goods; as com'merce, to amerce.
- mersion, } are verbs related to mercus, the participle of the verb mergo, to dip or plunge;
-merse, } as to immerse, immersion, emersion.
-meter, } are relations of the Greek noun μέτρον, (metron,) a measure; as diameter, chrono-
-metry, } meter; geometry, symmetry.
-mire, are from compounds of the Latin verb miror, to wonder at; as to admire; or are formed with the English noun mire, dirt, as to bemire. But pismire classes with neither of these.
- mit, } are relations of the Latin verb mitto, to send, to certify, whose preterit is
-mise, } misi; as to demit, to remit, to commit; to demise, to promise; demission,
-mission, } omission.
-monish, are from compounds of the Latin verb monere, to advise; as to admonish.
-monstrate, are from compounds of the Latin verb monstro, to show; as to demonstrate.
-morphosis, are relations of the Greek noun μορφωσις, (morphosis,) a form or shape; as metamorphosis.
- most, are Saxon or English superlatives; as endmost, hindmost, uppermost.
-mote, are relations either of motus, the participle of the Latin verb moveo, to move; as to promote, remote, (adj.); or are Saxon compounds signifying a meeting; as wardmote, folkmote.
- mount, are related to the French verb monter, to ascend; as to surmount; paramount.
-move, see -mote.
-mure, are verbs related to the Latin noun murus, a wall; as to immure.
-mute, } are from compounds of the Latin verb mutare, to change; as to commute, to trans-
-mutation, } mute; transmutation.
- ness, are abstract nouns substantive of Saxon parentage, or formed on the model of such, by adding the termination to an adjective; as goodness, badness, plentifulness, destructiveness. If names of places, the termination signifies a promontory; as Toineas, Sherness.
- neurosis, are relations of the Greek noun νῦρον, (neuron,) a nerve; as, aponeurosis.
-nect, are relations of the Latin verb necto, to tie or join, whose preterit is nexi; as -nex, } to connect; to annex.
-nomy, } are relations of the Greek noun νόμος, (nomos,) a law; distribution, arrangement;
-nome, } as astronomy, economy; metronome. The Greek noun is from the verb νίμω, (nemo,) to distribute; and hence, in some words related to the above, the first two letters are ne instead of no. Monome is not a relation of these words, but of those terminating in -onymy, which see. See also -ogonomy.
- normous, are relations of the Latin word norma, a rule or standard; as abnormous, enormous.
- o, are none of them words of Saxon parentage, but come to us from the Italian, and other languages; as stucco, portico; mulatto; lumbago; eringo.
- ocese, are relations of οἶκος, (oikos,) a dwelling; as diocese. Diecian is also a relation.
-ode, } are nouns from the Greek noun ὕδης, (o-de,) a song; as epode, palinode; parody,
-ody, } monody.
-oid, } are relations of the Greek verb οἶδμαι, (eidomai,) to seem, to be like, whose preterit
-oidal, } is οἶδα, (oida); or of the kindred noun εἶδος, (eidos,) a form or likeness; as conoid, coralloid, spheroid; spheroidal, cycloidal.
- oir, } are adopted French words; as memoir, eecrutoire, bourgeois, chamois, turquoise.
-oire, } Noise is from an old correspondent French word. Poise and its compounds are

- tend, } are frequently relations of the Latin verb tendo, to stretch, whose participle is
- tent, } tentus; as to distend, to pretend, (of which latter the sense is figurative, as well as of most other of the compounds;) intent, disintent. But some of the words ending in tent are relations of teneo, (see -tain), whose participle is also tentus; as content: others have no relationship to either class; as potent: see -ent.
- temper, are relations of the Latin verb tempero, to moderate; as to attempt, to distemper.
- test, are relations of the Latin verb testor, to call to witness; as to attest, to obtest. The original meaning scarcely remains in to contest, and to detest, though still found in the Latin use of these words.
- th, are frequently nouns substantive formed originally in Saxon, or imitated in modern English, by adding the last two letters to an adjective, a verb, or a substantive, often with some slight change of the word, previously to the addition: thus, from wide, warm, strong, deep, are formed width, warmth, strength, depth; from moon is formed month; from to bear and to ear, birth and earth.
- theism, } are relations of the Greek noun θεός, a god; as polytheism, atheism; pantheon.
- theon, } The last word comes to us through the Latin, or it would have been pantheon.
- thesis, } are relations of thesis, (thesis,) a placing or position; θέμα, (thema), that which
- them, } is placed; θέτις or θητικός, (thetos or theticos), placed;—all of them from the
- thet, } Greek verb τίθημι, (tithēmi), to place or lay down; as metathesis, hypothesis;
- thetic, } epithem; epithet; synthetic, hypothetic. Except mathesis, which is from a Greek verb, whose future tense is μαθήσομαι, (mathe'somai) to learn:—and pathetic, which is related to the words in -pathy, which see.
- thorp, if names of places, imply a country house or landed possession; as Bishopthorpe.
- thral, are compounds of the Saxon noun thrall, a servant or slave; as to intral.
- tide, are compounds of the Saxon word tide, which has a primary and a consequential meaning, viz. time or season; and the flow of water, which happens at returning times or seasons: hence, Whitsuntide, and to betide, with the former sense; and spring-tide, counter-tide, with the latter.
- tangent, } are relations of the Latin verb tango, (written tingo in compounds,) to touch;
- tingent, } whose participle is tactus. The form was originally tago, instead of tango;
- tact, } whence the termination liguus: hence, the words co-tangent; contingent; contact;
- tiguous, } contiguous.
- tion, are nouns substantive corresponding with Latin substantives in tio, many of them derived through the French, or formed spontaneously on the model of such; as probation, inspection, ambition, unction, filtration, flotation.
- tive, are nouns adjective, but often used substantively, sometimes shortened from Latin adjectives in ivus, but generally formed in imitation of French adjectives in if, whose feminine is iee; as collective, perspective, talkative: compare -sive.

- tomy, } cutting, a section, a piece cut off; as apotomy, epitome; anatomy, lithotomy.

Words ending in

- ton*, } are frequently names of places compounded with the Saxon word ton or tun, an enclosed place; as Teddington, Edmonton, Hillingdon. The latter termination may sometimes be a corruption of den, (see -dean,) or of down, a hill; or of din, which also signified a town: but it is most commonly another form of ton.
- tort*, are relations of tortus, the participle of the Latin verb torqueo, to twist, to bend; as to distort, to extort; a retort.
- tory*, see -ory.
- tract*, } are relations of tractus, the participle of the Latin verb traho, to draw; as to subtract, to retract; an abstract. The verb to portray is of the same family, but it comes to us through the French. Concerning another verb, to betray, the relationship is doubtful: the termination comes to us through the French trahir, which is supposed, by some, not to be derived from traho, but trado, to yield up.
- tray*, }
- tre*, see -re.
- tribute*, are relations of tributus, the participle of the Latin verb tribuo, to give, bestow, or impute; as to attribute, to contribute; an attribute.

- ult*, are from correspondent Latin words in ultus; as adult, tumult.
- ume*, are generally from Latin words in umen, umus, or uma, often through the French; as volume, plume.
- um*, are mostly words adopted from Latin, many of them originally Greek, in which language they terminate in u, (on); as perigeum, medium, opium. Chemists have chosen this as the characteristic termination of the names of the metals; as, platinum, itrium, potassium, sodium, &c. These words are of course only assimilated to Latin: but aureum, argentum, ferrum, &c., are Latin words, and may be used for gold, silver, iron, &c., though the English words are generally employed: on the other hand, tungsten, bismuth, and some of the other metals, have no names in Latin, and appear to have no assimilated names.
- ure*, are very frequently from Latin words through the French or Italian; as pleasure, picture, literature.
- uret*, see -ret.
- us*, are Latin words, many of them originally Greek, in which language they terminate in us, (os); as syllabus, genus, incubus.

which has the same meaning as the French guise, and the Italian guisa; as lengthwise, otherwise, slantwise.
- wort, are names of herbs imitating Saxon compounds with wort, a herb; as lungwort, danewort.
- worth, if names of places, imply a farm or court; as Wandsworth, Bosworth; this being one of the meanings of the Saxon word worth.
- wright, are compounds of the Saxon word wright, a workman, or formed in imitation of them; as a shipwright, a wheelwright.
- y, are frequently adjectives formed by adding the y to substantives; as from wealth, wealthy; from wood, woody; from stealth, (which is from steal), stealthy. It is a termination which classical words frequently take on being Anglicized; as from pietas, piety; from anatome, anatomy; from acrimonia, acrimony; from breviarium, breviary; from cæmeterium, cemetery; from sudatorium, sudatory.
- zon, are frequently adopted French words, or, if from classical words, they come to us through the French; as gazon, to blazon, horizon. But Amazon, a Greek compound, comes to us directly from Latin.

The foregoing Index would have been unnecessarily swelled by terminations of obvious import, or such whose import may be found in the dictionary under the same letters as separate words; hence, the common terminations of words like the following are not inserted:—Saveall, football, to debar, tenbed, to disbelieve, sideboard, hidebound, elbow, footboy, to miscal, to decump, madcap, to recast, antichamber, cornchandler, turncoat, weathercock, dovecote, Sunday, henceforth, finchdrawer, dewdrup, butend, disesteem, windfull, bedfellow, barefoot, misgive, hourglass, foreground, behindhand, blockhead, dishonour, inkhorn, malthouse, doorkeeper, wedlock, taskmaster, belmun, charwoman, to unmask, windmill, cheesemonger, godmother, surname, twilight, to benight, &c. Neither are terminations of obvious meaning in the names of places inserted; such, for instance, as in Trombridge, Holbeach, Colnbrook, Whitchurch, Rochdale, Enfield, Eccleshall, Milfordhaven, Millhill, Westminster, Liverpool, Devonport, Godstone, Holywell, Runnymede, Windermere, Portsmouth, &c.

CRITICAL PRONOUNCING DICTIONARY

OF THE

ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

* * When a word investigated belongs to a class, attention should be paid, not merely to the word itself, but to those associated with it: thus, a clearer notion of its various shades of meaning will be obtained, and the consistency or inconsistency of its current pronunciation better understood.

Of the words which, for these purposes, are classed together, it must not be deemed that the leading word is always the parent of the rest, but that, for whatever purpose of convenience or utility, it has been chosen to indicate the class.

Among the subjected words, a less near relationship, or some change in meaning or principle of pronunciation, is signified by the small capitals.

The pronunciation of the subjected words is seldom marked at full, and most commonly not at all, the syllabication, the accents, the letters in italic, and the figures referring to the Principles, aided by a comparison with the leading word, being deemed quite sufficient. The letters in italic in these subjected words are,

1. Those which, single or combined, are sounded irregularly, that is, otherwise than as indicated in the schemes; q and x, which are not in the schemes at all; and c and g, when separated in the syllabication from the e or i, which gives them their soft sounds, as in lac'erate, trag'le.

2. a and o, when sounded ă, â, and ô; a, e, and o, when sounded as in the last syllables of dollar, letter, sailor, (in each of which the last syllable is equivalent, or nearly equivalent to ur;) and th, when sounded as in this.

3. Silent letters, if idle as well as silent; but not such significant silent letters as in the scheme are printed a, c, i, o, u, y, w, h; nor e as in native, hostile, where the irregularity should be conceived to be the short sound of the i, rather than the superfluity of the e.

4. Letters which are not decidedly irregular in sound, but become so in easy, fluent, speech, being such as fall into the sound of y consonant, or of sh, zh, ch, or j. And note, that when the meaning of the italics is not explained by what appears at the place, (see, for instance, Ab-bre'vi-a-ture.) the explanation is given in the Principles, as referred to by the figures. Note also, that if the reference 147 occurs, and the letters liable to the irregular sound are not in italic, the meaning is, that the irregularity in such instance is a colloquialism merely, and not a propriety.

In a word having more than one accent, the principal accent is denoted by the double accentual mark (//). See 85.

ABA

A, the first letter in the alphabet. An article set before nouns of the singular number, in which capacity it often takes the letter n after it for the sake of euphony: see the word An. A is sometimes a noun, as, a great A; it is sometimes placed before a participle, as, gone a hunting, come a begging; it has a signification denoting proportion, as, the landlord asks a hundred a year.

A is always named ă, but is sounded â whenever it is an unaccented word or syllable in a purely English phrase: see Principles 24, 176. Its sounds with other letters are numerous. See the vowel scheme, and the numbers corresponding to the sounds of a in the Principles; see also 97, 98, 99, 111, 112.

A-, initial, in words originally Greek, is often a prefix of privative meaning, as in A-galaxy, A-scii; in which use, as well as when an article, it takes a between it and a following vowel, as in An-archy. In words of Saxon origin, the prefix A is a mere syllabic augment, as in A-bare, A-dry, &c. for Bare, Dry, &c.

AB-, a prefix of Latin origin which enters into the composition of many of the following words; as Ab-actor, &c. It signifies from.

BY=bÿ, [as a prep. often bē, 176] prep. ad. and a. Originally, this word is the same as the prefix Be-, or the verb To be: it signifies existence and proximity, and as a preposition is placed before a noun or pronoun of specification in connection with some verb, its alleged various meaning as a preposition being that of the various context, and not of the preposition abstractedly. As an adverb, it likewise signifies near; hence it comes to signify aside; over or neglectingly; away. As an adjective, in composition its most frequent meaning is private, retired: as a By'-corner, By'-room, By'-lane, By'-street, By'-turning, By'-walk, By'-way, By'-end, By'-law, By'-view, By'-drinking; in all of which it signifies private. In By-gone, By-past, it signifies over. In By-speech, By-name, By-stroke, By-word, it signifies aside; a speech, a name, a stroke, a word which a person turns aside, or stops for a moment to utter or make. To be a By-name is to be a name which all persons stop in their discourse or way to utter. In the same manner, a By-word is a word of common utterance, a proverb. In By-stander, it has its plain original meaning, near.

BYE, bÿ, s. A Saxon word signifying a dwelling; village; or town; and hence, according to some etymologists, the term By-laws, namely, the peculiar laws of the place.—See the word above, among the compounds of By. In the expression Good bye, it has been supposed to have the meaning of passage or journey; in which case the phrase is exactly equivalent to Farewell: but is not the sentence a contraction of Good, or God be with you (Good be wi' ye), and so equivalent to Adieu!

To CAST (pret. and part. the same)=cāst, 11: v. a. and n. To throw, to fling; of this, the original sense of the word, all the other senses are either figurative derivations, or modifications by adverbial particles, such as, about, aside, away, down, forth, off, out,

The sign = is used after modes of spelling that have no irregularity of sound.

Consonants: mīsh-ūn, i. e. mission, 165: vīsh-ūn, i. e. vision, 165: thīn, 166; thēn, 166.

up, upon. Thus, To cast, as a law term, is to throw or fling figuratively, that is, to defeat the party either by criminal or civil process; thus again, To Cast a brazen statue, is, to throw liquid brass into the mould in order to form the statue; so also, to cast the characters in a play, is, to throw the characters into certain hands for representing them; and hence To Cast, may signify to contrive generally. The modified meanings which are given by the adverbial particles, are likewise either plain or figurative. Thus, To cast away, may signify, simply, to throw away, or, figuratively, to make shipwreck; To cast up, is, simply, to throw up, to vomit; or figuratively, to throw the eye up a line of figures, or to throw them into one heap; and hence, to compute generally; and so of the other particles:—new. To throw, the object thrown being figurative and understood, as the mind or the thoughts; to be capable of being thrown or moulded; to receive a certain shape; to warp; to incline or fall off.

To COME, cūm, 107: } v. n. To advance nearer,
I CAME=cāme, } as opposed to go; to arrive;
COME, cūm, 107: } to rise; to reach; to happen; to appear in sight; to become: In the imperative it is often used interjectionally, in order to encourage, excite, or command attention: it is often used with an ellipsis, as Come Friday, that is, when Friday shall come. As to the numerous senses it expresses by prepositions, these differences should be sought for in the added particle, and not in the verb, which retains its meaning, either plainly or figuratively, in all the phrases it helps to form. Thus, To come by, expresses either a plain meaning—as, "He came by the door," that is, he advanced on his way by or near the door; or a figurative meaning—as, "He came by his death," that is, he arrived at, or happened on, his death: and so of other phrases. In the expression, "The butter comes," the meaning is figurative: it advances nearer to us as butter from the state it was in.

ESSENCE=ēs-sēnct, s. In exploded metaphysics, that which by original necessity makes a thing what it is, and exists even when the thing itself exists not. In Locke's philosophy, the essence of a substance is nominal or real, nominal when it merely gives the name to the species under which the substance is ranked; real, when it is the nature or constitution from which all the qualities of the substance flow. This distinction will be more correctly understood by viewing a nominal essence as nothing more than the conditions of some notion, which notion, by its very definition, has existence only within the bounds of that definition; while a real essence is either a vague hypothesis, or it is that constitution or mixture of elements in the individual thing which seems to render it what it is, and flowing not from any necessity that we are acquainted with a priori, is learned by us only through experience; existence; constituent substance; species of being.—See also lower.

with tendency to; with appropriation to; during;
&c. Because of the account that, in regard to;
in consideration of.

Webster's etymology gives no countenance to Horne Tooke's theory that this word always signifies cause or reason, yet such expressions as the following are most easily explained by the latter hypothesis: O! for better times, i. e. I wish, the cause of my wishing being better times: For all that, i. e. all that being a cause or reason to the contrary: For him to speak would be wrong, i. e. to speak would be wrong, he being the cause, or with regard to him as the speaker.

To FORAGE, &c., FORAMINOUS, FORCE, &c., FORCEPS, &c., FORD, &c.—See in the next column but one, after all the words compounded with For.

FOR-, a Saxon prefix which seems to have been originally used to indicate the restriction of a word to the purpose particularized by the context: thus To Forbear was to bear for something in particular, or on some certain account: To Forbid, was to bid restrictively, or for the prevention of something: To Forget was to get the mind into a certain state for or with regard to some object: hence the words came to have the restricted senses to which they were thus most frequently limited: hence also, in some instances, a privative, a negative, or an intensive force. It must be noted, however, that For- is sometimes a corruption of Fore, as Fore is often used where the original prefix was For-.

Fore-know-a-ble, 101: a. That may be foreknown.

Fore-knowl-edge, (-nôl'-êdg, 157, 136, 168) s.

Prescience; the knowledge of something that will happen; the knowledge of all that will happen. Man originally knows nothing that will happen; it is by experience, reason, and calculation, he acquires a fore-knowledge of certain events, but more particularly of those which are placed within his own power and will, but for which he would indeed have been quite unable to form that notion of foreknowledge, the effect of divine will and power, which he ascribes to the Creator: And as what man brings to pass he wills shall happen, we ascribe this condition also to the Creator, and conceive him to will all that comes to pass; the fatalists go further, and, because the Maker wills and effects all things, conclude that man wills and effects nothing; forgetting that their notion of the Almighty free-will is derived only from what they have experienced of free-will and power in themselves: If the Creator wills all things, He wills among the rest that man's will shall be free, that is, he wills that man shall elect either good or evil; (see Free-will.) Although therefore it is true that man cannot but act according to his Maker's will in one sense, that is, so far as his Maker permits, and foreknows he will act, yet it is likewise true, (or we limit the gift of the Creator and consequently His power of giving,) that man can, within the limits assigned, both choose his course, and act according to his choice, and so can, if he please, act contrary to his Maker's will in another sense, that is, contrary to His precept or command. The difficulty we feel in conceiving freedom of choice in man, while we admit the Creator's foreknowledge of what that choice will be, is considerable certainly,
